*Argentina: President Guido's efforts to pull together a new cabinet continue to be tortuous.

Guido has now made four appointments (two of them temporary), but he needs to make four more. This may take several more days.

In the meantime, Guido's appointment of Bernardo Bas, a trade union leader who reportedly has Peronist links, is not likely to sit well with anti-Peronists even though it was approved by General Ongania, the real power behind the throne.

Guido appears to be having difficulty persuading cabinet officers to accept appointment because of the political uncertainty that is bound to persist between now and the elections set for 7 July. He may, however, find it somewhat easier to fill the remaining vacancies if the 20 May deadline for the filing of candidates passes without incident.

Turkey: Prime Minister Inonu may offer the resignation of his tripartite coalition government within the next few days and call for new elections, even though they are not mandatory until 1965. Inonu reportedly has been having trouble keeping the small coalition parties in line and probably believes his Republican People's Party could at this time capture much of the popular support formerly given them. He may have difficulty, however, in convincing his military backers that he should take this course of action.

Congo: UN officials privately state that they plan to withdraw all UN forces from the Congo--some 12,000--by the end of the year because of financial and manpower shortages. Plans to train the Congo army so that it can maintain order by itself have made little progress, however. Afro-Asian objections to Adoula's choice of five NATO members and Israel to do the training have caused U Thant to decline a coordinating role for the UN, and three of the countries are reluctant to do the job without a UN umbrella.
