I take pleasure in confirming formally at this time the proposals made by our Deputy Director (Intelligence) in June of last year for a second conference on intelligence methods, and in cordially inviting you to send a delegation to such a conference under the auspices of the Central Intelligence Agency in Washington on 15-19 October of this year.

The general theme of the conference -- Impact of a changing world on the conduct of intelligence: Problems and techniques -- is a resumption of the methodological tenor of the first conference so successfully held [redacted]. The occasion of this conference also should provide opportunity, in the days preceding or following the more formal meetings, for such additional discussions between members of delegations as are appropriate at the time.

4. The second conference will resume the methodological theme of the first; subjects include scientific aids to collection, techniques of information processing, relationships between various sorts of intelligence components, and special problems posed by Bloc organization and world developments. Only very incidentally would there be any confirming or modifying of country positions on matters of substantive intelligence as a result of this conference.
