SINO-SOVIET BORDER CONFRONTATION EASES

No shooting has been reported in the area of the disputed island in the Ussuri River on the Sino-Soviet border since 19 March, and the situation there appears to have stabilized.

During the past week, Peking has shown little interest in continuing propagandist exploitation of the border conflict, and probably believes it has already made a strong case regarding ownership of the island. Chinese commentary on the clashes has all but ended and there have been no anti-Soviet demonstrations in China for almost two weeks.

Soviet propagandist output is still voluminous with the accent largely on patriotic themes. There is also a hint of a shift in focus from the disputed island to the larger issue of border demarcation. On 20 March two Soviet newsmen privately informed US Embassy officials that a statement on the border situation was being prepared that would express a willingness to discuss broader boundary demarcation problems as well as a solution to the disagreement over the disputed island.

Although no statement has yet come forth, Moscow might profess a willingness to negotiate in order to gain a propagandist advantage. The Russians, however, undoubtedly realize that Peking would demand a Soviet recognition of the 19th century treaties establishing the present frontiers as "unequal treaties" before entering into any border negotiations. A Chinese Foreign Ministry statement on 10 March denounced Moscow for refusing to concede this point during the boundary talks in 1964. As a result, any serious dialogue on border problems seems unlikely. Spring floods will inundate the island in a few weeks and reduce the chance of further clashes. [REDACTED]
