PRELIMINARY REMARKS

During the twenty-four years of its official existence the Third (Communist) International played a key role in the world-wide organization and development of the revolutionary Marxist movement. As the first global political machine in history, it coordinated the efforts of groups of determined and fanatical agitators and revolutionaries in almost every nation and colonized area of the world. To no small degree the enormous (rowth of world communism in our generation has been due to its integrating and compulsive force.

A "scientific" political-economic movement with the rualities of a religious crusado, a movement dedicated to achieving a single simple aim-the complete abelition of classes and the realization of socialism in the entire world--b: means of the revolutionary seizure of power by urban factory workers led by a disciplined vanguard, international communism has profited greatly from the direction and assistance of a highly-trained, professional staff of revolutionaries who > kopt pure the basic doctrine of "scientific" socialism expounded by Marx, amended by Lenin, and stabilized by Stalin;

ostablished patterns of Party organization and functioning based upon the long experience of the Bolshevik party before and after the Soviet revolution;

dictated the strategy and analyzed the tactics of national Party propaganda and action;

pooled the knowledge gained by the experience of each Party for the bonefit of all;

trained national cadros in political, secret intelligence, and subversive activities; provided funds for Party work-from newspaper budgets to revolutionary war-chests;

and Coveloped a climate of personal professional relationships indisponsable for maintaining cohesion and singlemindedness in international political action.

The international Communist revenent very early in its career organized itself throughout on the Leninist principle of contralism, which called for an authoritative center responsible for the interpretation of doctring and the dotormination of strategy and tactics and for semimilitar subordination of lover to higher scholons. Applied on the national as well as the international lovel, this principle gave the Comintorn its characteristic organizational pattern. The national partics affillated with the Third International were organized around Central Committees which exercised national command functions. International contralization was achieved by the Executive Committee of the Comintern in Moscow which was established as the high command of the entire Communist movement. The Comintern therefore represented not only a federation of parties joined together for common action, but also a complex and tightly organized headquarters command staff which assumed control over the various national contors, and was itself closely integrated into the executive center of the one Communist Party which had already succeeded in seizing power. Communist moves provided the general staff of the world revolution, and however its dissolution may be interpreted, the Leminist-Stalinist principle of contralization, without which (from the Communist point of vicw) a revolutionary movement is impossible, has not been abandoned.

No small part of the successful development of the Communist movement-particularly during the fascist thirties and during the war itself--has been due to its practical combination of "legal" and "illegal"* activities in fighting against the political, social, and police opposition it was faced with everywhere outside the Soviet Union. The contributions of Third International headquarters to the effective illegal life of the world party have been of singular importance. Ranging from the provision of money, the "black" movement of personnel, the provision of safe-haven inside the USSR to the training of national cadres in the arts of espionage, sabotage, and clandestine organization and propaganda work, the direction of the world Center has guaranteed the permanent existence of every national section whatever the nature or sprongth of the repressive forces directed against it.

The Third (Communist) International was "dissolved" by decree in 1943. The dissolution of the headquarters was authentic: the bureaucratic structure, the po sonnol assignments, and the delogated functions as they existed in the late '30s were actually liquidated. The efficient functioning of the international Communist movement was nonetheless little affected by this "dissolution" of its parent steering organization, and the formal grouping of time European Parties announced 5 October 1947 simply establishes on a more systematic organizational basis the functional coordination and contralized control which the Communist movenent has never lost. The present paper accordingly presents an analysis of the "dissolved" Comintern, not out of historical interest, but as providing an indisponsable factual basis for an estimate of the organization and functioning of international Communism today. This paper will be followed by an overall roster of personnel connected with the Third Internotional before 1943, and subsequently by a detailed appreciation of the mothods and tochniques by which international Communism has, since 1943, maintained the rigid contralism which beday contributes so largely to its successful exploitation by the Soviet government in the non-diplomatic implementation of its foreign policy.

I. ORIGIN AND PURPOSE OF THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL

The "scientific" socialism of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, offering not only a critical analysis of modern capitalist society but also a clearly-outlined program for action to be carried out by the working masses of the world, gave birth to a sories of international workers' associations dedicated to the purpose of translating Marxist doctrine into social action.

Marx himself initiated the international Communist movement with the founding of the Communist League in June 1847 (carlier League of the Just) which was organized into communes (3-20 members), circles (2-10 communes), loading circles, Contral Committee, and a Congress. This miniature league of "advanced workers" accepted the programmatic principles and tactics of Marx and Engels and commissioned the former to draw up the Communist Manifosto which was published in February 1848 and contained "the Party policy of the Communists, insofar as it can be made public." The Communist League, however, was only the forerunner of the first authentic International, the union of English, German, French, and Itialian workers' societies founded at London in 1864 as the International Workingmon's Association and for which Marx again, after some manouvering, wrote a program (the Inaugural Address) which, with strong concessions to "the present standpoint of the workers' movement," established the soliderity of the proletariat in all countries as the fundamental principle of the International. A series of seven Congresses (1865-72) culminated in the Hegue Congress when the International split with the expulsion of Bakunin and his anarchist faction and the Exacutive General Council was transforred from London to New York where it formally died in 1874.

As the European labor parties grew in the '70's and '80's, various attempts were made to ro-found the International, but they did not succeed until the Foundation Congress of the Second International, Paris, 1889. As the socialist movement developed in Europe during the next twenty five years, the moderate "reformist" or "opportunist" wing of the major parties grow to dominate the movement, and with the outbreak of World War I the Marxist parties - with few exceptions - voted war credits and gave full support to their own "bourgoois" governments in the "imporiclist" strugglo.

For Lonin, the leader of the Bolshevik or revolutionary section of the Russian Social-Democratic Party, who had been fighting this opportunist trond in his own party since 1903, the "betrayal" of the prolo-. tariat by the Socialists' desortion to the camp of the bourgooisis hidden behind the patriotic concept of "defense of the fatherland" marked the end of the Second International and called for the founding of a new International to carry on the fight for the preletarian revolution.

His plans for a new Communist world party, however, were realized only after the conclusion of the October Revolution in Russia (1917). The establishment of the Soviet regime in Russia through the successful action of the Bolshovik Section of the Russian Social Democratic Party gave enormous weight to Lenin's interpretation of Marxist doctrine and strategy, and actod as a powerful magnetic force in the workers' movement, tearing away fractions and ontire parties out of the framework of the Second International. In March 1919 an international conference of delegatos from several European Communist groups was hastily arranged in Moscow upon a wircloss appeal of the Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs, Chicherin, and the Third (Communist) International -- Comintern -was founded.

The preamble to the Constitution and Rules of the Communist International (1928) clearly defines its purpose:

"The Communist International - the International Workers' Association - is a Union of Communist Parties in various countries; it is a World Communist Party. As the leader and organizor of the world revolutionary movement of the prolotariat and the bearer of the principles and hims of Communism, the Communist International strives to win the majority of the working class and the broad strata of the propertyless peasentry, fights for the establishment of the

II. PRINCIPAL COMPONENTS OF THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL

The term "Comintern" or "Communist International" has consistently been employed in two senses -- correctly, as referring to the entire world-revolutionary complex of organized Communist Parties and their international executive apparatus, and, more narrowly, as a convenient term for the executive apparatus in Moscow itself and its communications and action agencies in the field. Taking the term in its first inclusive meaning naturally requires at least cursory consideration of the principal action components of the Comintern-the national sections or parties themselves--before examining the structure and functioning of the headquarters organization.

A. Sections.

The world Communist movement developed repidly from its initial start in Earch 1919 when the Russian Bolsheviks, with a more handful of non-Russian radicals from Gormany, Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, Sweden, and the United States, faced the task of creating and consolidating effective Communist organizations on every continent.

Prisoners of World War I were infiltrated by Lenin into Austria and Hungary to organize the first full-fledged Communist parties organized outside of Russia. The Communist Party of Germany was founded in January 1919, of the United States in September 1919, of France in December 1920, of Italy in January 1921, etc. The parties of Indo-China, Cyprus and Iceland affiliated themselves with the Comintern as late as 1931. By 1935 there were affiliated to the Comintern 76 Communist Parties and groups with a total membership of 3,926,000, the Communist Party of Soviet Russia comprising 3,141,000 members, and overall Communist Party strength in "capitalist" countries placed at 375,000*. In addition, Communist Youth Organizations counted 3,759,000 members in the USSR and 221,000 members abread. (The figures given at the Pan-British Communist Conference in March 1947 claim the existence of 68 parties with a total world membership of 18,592,300, including the Communist Party of Soviet Russia with 6,000,000 members).

The basic relations of the sections to the Committeen were regulated by the Conditions of Admission to the Communist International, cuently, any group or party desiring to join the Communist International, as well as any already affiliated section, had to accept, under penalty of exclusion, 21 "conditions" which called for:

> An emphatic break with the Second International. Lenin considered the destruction of the Second (Secialist) International a prorequisite for world-revolution and constantly fought Social-Democratic refermist or parliamentary methods inside and outside Comintern ranks. The Conditions therefore stipulated that each affiliated section draw up a new political program in conformity

* During the period 1935-1943, Communist Parties existed in Algeria, Alsece Lorraine, Arabia, Argentine, Australia, Austria, Bolgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Catalonia, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Donmark, Egypt, Ecuador, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Grdat Britain, Groece, Haiti, Holland, Hungary, Icoland, India, Indo-China, Indonesia, Iraq, Iran, Icoland, Italy, Japan, Korea, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxenbourg, Mexico, Morecco, Hew Zealand, Norway, Palestine, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippine Islands, Poland, Porto Rice, Portugal, Rumania, Siam, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Syria, Transjordania, Tripolitania, Tunisia, Turkey, Union of South Africa, Uruguay, USA, USSR, Venezuela, Yugoslavia,

 The Communist International of Youth, a Comintern auxiliary, enjoyed section status without being a National Party.

with Comintern resolutions (#15); make itself clearly distinguishable from Social Democratic or Socialist parties by designating itself as "Communist Party of, Soction of the Third Communist International" (#7); fight the labor unions affiliated with the Second International and support the Red International of Labor Unions)Profintern) created by the Comintern (#10); break with, and expel from its ranks, all "refermists" (i.e., non-revolutionary) elements (#2,7); renounce and expesse social patriotism and social pacifism (#6).

DP78-02646R000600130001-7

The creation of a strong controlized Party. The creation of a unified, centralized, disciplined party, capable of achieving revolutionary objectives, was made obligatory for affiliated sections by #12 of the Conditions:

"In the present epoch of intensified civil war, the Communist Party can discharge its duty only if it will be reganized with the highest degree of contralization, ruled by iron discipline bordering on military discipline, and if its party center will prove to be a potent authoritative body invested with broad powers and enjoying the general confidence of the party merbers."

Since this conception of the party was hold incompatible with any factionalism within its ranks, and since Lonin was particularly eager to remove all remnants of the Second International, the sections were bound to purge their organizations regularly and systematically, particularly of "reformists and followers of the centre", even at the cost of replacing experienced functionaries (#2, #13).

The creation of illegal apparats. The Belshevik leaders, who had accumulated a vast experience in underground work during the "illogal" period of their existence, early realized, especially as the tide of European revolution receded, not only that the sections must prepare for the time when they might be forced to go underground, but also that legal, overt methods would not be adequate to carry out their revolutionary program. Condition #3 reads: "The class struggle in almost every country of Europe and Amorica is entoring the phase of civil war. Under such conditions the Communists can have no confidence in bourgeois laws. They should create overywhere a parallel illegal apparatus, which at the decisive moment should be of assistance to the party to do its duty toward the revolution. In every country where, in consequence of martial law or other exceptional laws, the Communists are unable to carry on their work legally, a combination of legal and illegal work is absolutely necessary".

Similarly, #13 of the statutes of the Comintern states that "the general state of things in the whole of Europe and of America makes necessary for the Communists of the whole world an obligatory formation of illegal Communist organizations along with those existing legally. The Executive Committee (of the Comintern) shall be bound to see that this shall be carried out everywhere."

Two categories of illegal action agencies (apparats) were therefore evolved by the sections under Comintern supervision: agencies which were ready to carry out underground party work in the event of the prohibition or suppression of the legal party (underground apparat), and those which eperated alongside the legally functioning party, performing such pre-revolutionary duties as suborage, paranilitary training, and espionage (parallel apparat).

Compulsory support of the Soviet Union. Each section was obliged to "render every possible essistance to the Soviet Republics in their struggle against all counter-revolutionary forces" (#14).

Active penetration of non-Communist prachizations. Each party was bound to penetrate labor unions, cooperatives and other labor organizations in order to gain effective control over other organs of the workers' revenent. Communist fractions engaged in such work were completely controlled by the section (#9).

Party control of parliamentary fractions. Communist fractions elected to constitutional parliamentary bodies were to conform strictly to the policy laid down by the Control Committee of the section and were to be purged of "unreliable" elements (#11).

Anti-Importalist policy. Sections in countries with colonies were obliged to advocate and support the "liberation" of colonial populations (%6).

Compulsory propaganda activities. All propaganda and agitation work was to be harmonized with the program and decisions of the Comintern, and all propaganda modia as well as personnel were to be subject to strict control by the leading organs of the section ($\frac{1}{2}$). Subversion propaganda and agitation was to be carried but in every military organization, by legal or illegal means ($\frac{1}{2}$). Systematic propaganda work in rural districts was similarly made obligatory ($\frac{1}{2}$).

The overall supremacy of the Comintern. The supremacy of the Comintern over its sections, clearly illustrated by the Conditions already cited, was formally stipulated in #16, which declared that all resolutions of the organs of the Comintern were binding for the sections, and that the Third International should be contralized in a better manner than the Second International. In making resolutions which were to be publicized by the sectional priss, Comintern organs were morely obliged to consider the variety of conditions under which the national parties had to work.

B. Interrelation of Sections: Federations.

According to Comintorn statutes, all sections, but particularly those in "importalist" countries and their colonies as well as those in adjacent countries, were to maintain close organizational and informational contact with each other, arrange for mutual representation at each other's conferences and congresses, and-with the consent of the Executive Committee of the Comintern-exchange loading functionaries.

Individual members of sections were permitted to travel from one country to another only with the consent of the Control Committee of their own section-with ut such consent they were not to be accepted into other sections. In the case of a Communist's changing his domicile, he was abliged to join the section in the country of his new residence.

Boyond these ensual relations, sections were entitled to form "Federations"* with the consent and under the supervision of the Executive Committee of the Committee. The purpose of such Federations was to provide more effective coordination of the activities of parties with common political objectives. The following Federations are known to have existed:

* The recently established nine-Party "Information Bureau" at Belgrade is organizationally almost identical with the pre-war "Federations" except that the CPSU is a direct participant.

1. The Federation of Scandinavian Communist Parties. A Federation of the Communist Parties of Sweden, Norwey, Denmark, Finland, and Icoland was formed in January 1924, and operated through a secretariat which was to utilize the experience of other Communist Parties in the interests of the Scandinavian Porties.

2. The Balkan Communist Foderation. Created in 1920 upon the initiative of Bulgarian Communists, and linked directly to the Comintern through its Secretary General, Kelerev, who was also a member of the ECCI pressidium, the Federation advocated the autonomy of Macedonia and Thrace, and established a united front with the Macedonian revolutionaries in INRO. The organization, functioning through an Executive Committee and a Political Bureau, supervised the political activities of the Balkan sections from its headquarters in Vienna (reportedly broken up by the police in 1928).

In 1923, the Comintern established a so-called "Labor Office" in Salanica, which served as full-powered field representative of the Federation in Groece. Staffed by Jews, Russians, and Comintern Balkan agents, the office furnished arms, served as a relay station for travelling Comintern agents, and--after 1926-directed an intelligence section established by the Greek Communist Party in Salamica. This office was suppressed by the police in 1930.

In 1926, the Federatian was further reported to have sont (unidentified) permanent representatives to Rumania and Greece.

From 1929 (the year of the 8th Conference of the Balkan Communist Federation) up to the war no information on the existence or activity of the ergenization is available.

3. The Latin American Federation. In February 1925 the illegal parties of Brazil, Peru, Colombia, and Custemala and the legal party of Paraguay formed a federation which operated through a Secretariat charged with the coordination of Connunist propaganda in Latin America and with maintaining liaison with the Comintern.

C. The World Congress.*

In accordance with normal Communist practice on the national lovel, the individual sections affiliated to the Commutern at intervals sent one or more delegates to attend a congress of all sections for establishing international policy and electing the executive personnel of the international headquarters.

1. Function. Theoretically, the World Congress was the supreme policy-making body of the Comintern. Its primary functions were:

to discuss and docido programmatic, tactical, and organizational questions concerning the Comintern and its sections;

to alter the program and rules of the Comintern; to elect to elect the Executive Cormittee of the Communist International and the International Control Cormission; to allocate to each section a number of votes at the World Congross based on its strongth and political importance.

In practical torms, the World Congress served as an international forum at which general policies proviously worked out by the Executive Committee (see below) were formally prenounced and unanimously accepted. Such occasions also provided the delegates with the opportunity for informal exchange of views and information and for the transaction of confidential business. On the whole, however, the World Congress was a coremonial affair, not unlike a labor convention, and of primery significance only so far as evert Comintern strategic and thetical fluctuations were concorned.

The proparatory work of the World Congress was normally divided among several ad-hac commissions. On the pecasion of the Fifth World Congress, for example, the following Commissions had previously been organized by the Moscow staff: Mandate, Drafting, Political, Organization, Program, Trade Union, National and Colonial Questions, Peasant, Woman's Questions, Youth, Propagenda, Italian, Russian, British, Polish, Bulgarian, Japanese, German, and Scandinovian.

The Cormissions of the Sixth World Congress (1928) included the Program Conmission which drafted the statutes of the Committeen; the Colonial Cormission with its Negro Sub-Commission; the War Commission, which propared resolutions for "anti-military" work; the Credentials Cormission, and the Political Cormission, which in later years apparently became a standing commission of the Precondium.

The final pronouncements of the World Congresses took the form of "theses" and "resolutions", the former being authoritative overall politice-economic analyses of a given national or international situation, the latter generally representing outlines of concrete action programs.

2. The Seven World Congresses. The World Congress was, by statute, to convene every two years. In the period 1919-35 actually seven congresses were hold--all at Moscow:

The First World Congress (March 1919), which founded the Comintern, limited its open activities to pronouncements of revolutionary propaganda and issued a manifeste to the proletariat of the world in which it pledged allogiance to the principles haid down in Marx's Communist Manifesto of 1848. It maintained that world revolution was imminent and that it was the purpose of the Comintern to assure the speedy and final victory of Communism. The Congress also expressed the belief that within the year all of Europe would be under the rule of Soviets.

The Socond World Congress (July-August 1920) adopted the theses and statutes of the Comintern which were formulated by nonbers of the Russian Communist Party, and began the work of creating a highly contralized organization. This congress still viewed the establishment of an international Soviet republic as realizable within the near future.

The Third World Congress (June-July 1921) acknowledged the failures of the Comintern's previous revolutionary policies in Europe and adopted tactics designed to win over the masses of non-Communist workers as a necessary preparation to the final revolutionary struggle which, under provailing conditions, appeared to be receding into the more distant future.

The Fourth World Congress (November-December 1922) elaborated the policies of its predecessor and worked out the tactics of the "united labor front", a tactic directed at the unification of the offerts of all workers in the fight against capitalism, including those who did not accept the Communist creed.

The Fifth World Congress (June-July 1924) continued to stress the importance of the slegen "To the masses" formulated by the Third Congress, and resolved to reorganize ("bolshevize") the various national Communist Parties by exploiting the experience of the Russian Communist Party. This Congress was marked by the intrusion into the international scene of the Stalin-Trotzky intraparty struggle in Russia.

The Sixth World Concrete (Nily-August 1928) adopted the "program" of the Comintern as drafted by Stalin. Confirming the revolutionary aims and methods of the Comintern, the program was mainly designed to harmonize Comintern destrine and strategy with Stalin's theory of "socialism in a single country": the aims of world revolution are best served by safeguarding the socialist experiment in the Soviet Union. Translated into practical terms, this meant organizational and political subordination of the national Communist Parties to the requirements of the Soviet Union foreign policy. The Congress also executed a sharp wing to the left, stignatizing all Social-Democrats as "Social Fascists" with whom no collaboration was possible.

The Seventh World Congress (July-August 1935), moving to the right, officially adopted the "unified front" policy of cooperation with the non-Communist left and the liberals which had already proved a success in France. In the face of the growing threat of Fascism and Nazism, the security of the USSE became the dominating notive of Community Left.

The Seventh Congress was the last official gathering of national section representatives. According to official Comintern sources, 510 delegates were present at this last Congress, 371 of when had decisive votes, the remainder advisory votes only. 42% of the delegates were 31-40 years old, 28.8% 21-30 years old, 28.2% ever 40. The bulk of the delegates (330) had joined the Party between 1917 and 1928; 104 had become members after 1928; and only 53 (all Russians) had joined before 1917. Only 275 out of the 510 delegates were workers, but 218 of the 371 decisive votes were held by workers, thus assuring the primarily "preletarian" complexion of the Congress. The delegates represented 65 of the 76 affiliated groups (including 19 "sympathizing" organizations); 26 of these groups were then operating legally, and 50 illegally.

D. The Executive Apparatus.

The World Congresses theoretically "elected" the personnel of the international hordquarters staff which provided the contralized direction and coordination of the sections in the universal compaign of the workers against the expitalistic system. This hondquarters--in common parlance the Comintern proper--essentially represented a policymaking and executive-administrative staff who controlled and directed the action of the national sections, although in the sphere of illegal activity it often engaged directly in political and subversive action to the extent required by the inability of the sections to carry out the national or, more particularly, international action required by a given tactical situation.

The constituent elements of the Comintern headquarters not only present the complexity and absence of clear demarcations of authority and function that would be anticipated from a world revolutionary organization working on different levels of legality, but they also passed through historical organizational and personnel changes proupted by the ready adaptability of all Communist organizations in suiting structure to fit need. Many questions of structure and function, further, remain confused or fragmentary simply because adequate evidence remains unevailable on countless aspects of headquarters and of headquarters-section activity-in spite of twenty-five years of work on the system by innumerable police and intelligence agencies of the "copitalist" world.

Essentially, this handquarters "elected" by the World Congresses comprised the Executive Committee of the Communist International (ECCI), the International Control Commission (ICC), and their subordinate and cuxiliary agencies. This complex is the subject of the following analysis.

E. The International Control Commission.

The International Control Commission, elected by the World Congress, represented the highest disciplinary and auditing agency of the Comintern, and was empowered

a. To investigate complaints of party members who had been disciplined by their Central Committee;

b. To initiate such investigations without formal complaint or upon request by the ECCI;

c. To audit the books of the Comintern.

The Commission was expressly forbidden to interfere in the political, organizational or administrative conflicts occurring within the sections of the Comintern.

Extremely little information is available on the activities of the ECCI. According to a report made at the Seventh World Congress, the Commission was concerned from 1929 to 1931 with disciplinary cases involving the leadership of the sections, while after 1931 it investigated eases of "individual party members" only.

Before 1935 the ICC also essisted the sections in "liquidating the Trotzkyite elements" and "fought against the right deviators who were ideologically exposed but not organizationally smashed at the Sixth World Congress." It is unknown, however, how the ICC implemented this police function.

From a financial report made by the ICC at the Seventh World Congress, it appears that the auditing activities of the Commission covered only the overt aspects of Comintern finances. However, the presence of the German Communist, Hugo Eberlein, on the ICC (1935) who was a field supervisor for the Comintern's Finance Department (see below) points to the fact that the ICC was also concerned with the clandestine aspects of Comintern finances.

In 1925, the ICC was composed of the following members:

III. THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL (ECCI)*

A. Principal Functions.

The ECCI was the control executive agency of the Comintern, and, as such, the actual international center of the world party. It comprised at one time a staff of approximately 500 on the headquarters level in Mescow, and a minimum of twice that number in field installations, i.e., in the areas of the national sections.

A proliminary assessment of ECCI functions can be made from the Comintern statutes themselves--especially these functions concorned with the political steering and control of the national sections:

a. To approve or disapprove the political programs of the sections. In case of the ECCI's refusal to endorse a program, the section concerned can appeal to the World Congress.

b. To issue obligatory instructions (directives) to the sections for immediate implementation. The section can appeal against these directives to the World Congress, but is obliged to carry then out pending the decision of the Congress.

c. To annul or mond decisions of the party congresses and control committees of the sections.

d. To expel from the Comintorn entire sections, groups or individuals who violate the program and rules of the Comintern, or the decisions of the World Congress and the ECCI.

e. To accept affiliation of organizations and parties sympathetic to Communism, and to accept the resignation of individuals or groups belonging to the Committeen.

f. To supervise the creation of illegal apparats on the national level.

g. To lovy dues on the sections.

The principal functions of the ECCI were roughly equivalent to those of a Control Committee on the national Party level. A national Control Cornittee, with its overt and covert executive-administrative apparatus, controls the strategic and tactical actions of all regional, sectional, and local elements of the Party. Similarly, the ECCI oporated as an international Control Condittee controlling the national Control Convittees of the sections-with the obvious exception of the Control Condittee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). The Comintern occasionally took pains to stress the important roles played by members of the national sections in its headquarters organization, but actual control was firmly established in the hands of the Control Committee of the CPSU. This patent fact was legalized by the statutes of the Conintern which stated that "the bulk of the work and responsibility in the ECCI lies with the party of that country where the Executive Corrittee finds its residence " From its inception to its extinction, the ECCI had its headquarters in Moscow.

An additional "logal" basis for the influence of the CPSU was secured through the statutery requirement that out of the fifteen to seventeen decisive votes in the ECCI five were to be reserved for the Party in whose geographical area the ECCI was located. Thus, an interlocking directorate between the Comintern and the CPSU was created, and loaders of the latter such as Stalin, Hamuilsky, Kuusinen, Loz vski, Moletev, Picknitzky, Bukherin, Zinoviev, and Radek, occupied key positions in the Comintern hierarchy.

A report by a renegade American Communist goes so far as to claim that the actual organizational machinory of the Comintorn was at one time controlled by a "small commission" composed of three nonbors of the CPSU -- Manuilsky, Kuusinon, and Piatnitzky -- which accordingly constituted a top-level command group inside the ECCI executive apparatus such as is found today within the Politbure of several of the major Parties.

B. General Structure.

Since the main function of the ECCI was that of an international Control Contribute, its structure closely paralleled the customary (post-1924) organization of a national Control Conmittee. The following comparison of the ECCI and the Control Executive Conmittee of the CPSU makes this equivalence closer:

Central Cormittee, CPSU

Elected by World Congress

Individual elements of the ECCI structure are, however, not duplicated in the conventional Central Committee pattern. The maintenance of international liaison was clearly a monoply of the ECCI and was concentrated on the clandestine level, in the International Liaison Section (ONS). The establishment of permanent bureaus in the areas of the sections, as well as the despatch of representatives and instructors, were also prerogatives of the ECCI. In general, however, the ECCI machine was a replica of any Central Committee, and conversely, the principal departments of the sections' Central Committees were international extensions of ECCI departments.

C. The Plenum.

Like the national Central Committee, the ECCI was not a permanent body, but convened periodically in plenary and enlarged plenary sessions of which thirteen have come to notice during the period between 1919

Approved For Release 199999240 CTA-RDP78-02646R000600130001-7 and 1935. Between sessions, the work of the ECCI was carried on by its permanent agencies (see below) the key positions of which were, as a rule, staffed with ECCI members.

As a committee sitting in occasional plenary sessions, the ECCI simply represented an assembly of Communists who played a leading role in their national sections. Membership in the ECCI was not shrouded in secrecy, and the Comintern and Party press normally published the names of elected members who, with the exception of delegates from illegal parties, used no cover names to obscure their identity.

The "theses" and "resolutions" arrived at in these sessions supplemented the theoretical and programmatic decisions of the World Congresses and were, although general in nature, binding for all echelons of the Comintern. Through them the Comintern strategists expressed their authoritativo appraisel of the conflicting forces in the political world After a first period of "acute revolutionary situations" which arona. was concluded with the defeat of the proletariat in Germany and other countries (1923), the Plenum acknowledged an "offensive of capital", the end of immediate revolutionary situations in Europe, and the shifting of the "revolutionary wave" to the colonial countries. By 1928, after a period of "capitalist reconstruction" the "relative stabilization of capitalism" became the pronounced basis of Communist strategy. In 1930, however, the Tenth Plenum announced that because of the crisis in the United States the pace of revolutionary developments would increase. The Eleventh Plenum (April 1931) found that "because of the deepening of the economic crisis and the increasing chances for a revolutionary crisis in a series of countries" the danger of an armed intervention against the USSR had increased, and described the primary task of the sections as the prevention of a war against the Soviet Union, especially through the conquest of the Socialist-led and therefore pro-bourgeois working class ("united front from below"). In 1932, the Twelfth Plenum announced the "end of capitalist stabilization" and acknowledged an "upsurge of revolutionary activities" in various countries, noting, 'nowever, the absence of immediate revolutionary situations and placing omphasis on the necessity of preventing a war against the Soviet Union by smashing the influence of the Social Democrats and by popularizing the Soviet Union.

It is perfectly clear that such general pronouncements as these were not sufficient to give the sections adequate tactical direction. The theses and resolutions of both the World Congress and the ECCI Plenum constituted compendia of basic (uidance for the sections. The precise and practical direction of the sections, however, emanated from the permanent political steering agencies of the ECCI--the actual managerial board of the Comintern.

D. The Permanent Agencies.

The permanent working departments and agencies of the ECCI carried out a vast assortment of assignments and functions which can very roughly be separated into political-propaganda direction and subversive action. No clear-cut differentiations of these two categories of activity can be made, nor did individual departments and sub-agencies of the ECCI confine their activities exculsively to one or the other field. In broad terms, however, the political direction was carried out primarily on a logal, i.c., public or ovort basis, though illegal or clandestine elements were often directly involved, while the executive work on subversive action abroad (financing, sabetage, espionage, revolutionary action) was naturally protocted by rigid socurity measures. The primary ECCI agencies concerned with political direction were the Praesidium, the Political Commission and Organization Eureau, the Political Secretariat, and the Sectional Secretariats. The primary action or action-service agencies of the ECCI comprised the Organization (later Cadre) Department, the Department for International Liaison, and the Finance Department. In addition, a variety of field stations and individual representatives were established by ECCI headquarters in the field to act as liaison and relay points between the Moscow headquarters and the national sections. These three groups of ECCI departments and agencies are analyzed in the following three chapters.

IV. PRIMARY POLITICAL STEERING AGENCIES OF THE ECCI

Of the permanent agencies authorized by the ECCI to work out political strategy and tactics within the framework of the theses and resolutions of the World Congresses and of the Plenary Sessions of the ECCI, the Praesidium apparently represented the supreme authority. However, in the later period of the Comintern, especially after 1935, the Political Secretariat appears to have absorbed much of the original rank of the Praesidium, if not a substantial portion of its functions. Key positions in both bodies were held by ECCI members, since the Praesidium--which was elected by the Plenum--itself appointed the members of the Political Secretariat. According to an ECCI decision of 1924, no less than fifteen ECCI members were obliged to reside in Moscow.

A. The Praesidium.*

Consisting of varying numbers of "full" and "alternate" members, the Praesidium (often referred to as the Board of Directors) was originally headed by a chairman--the "president of the ECCI" in a technical sense--who was elected by the World Congress as a testimonial to his superior position. However, when Zineviev, the last Praesidium chairman, was dismissed in 1926, the office was discontinued.

The domination of the Praesidium by the CPSU is clearly indicated by the fact that its hey members were drawn from the top rank of the CPSU leadership. Bukharin (member until 1928), Zinoviev, (member until 1926) and RADEK (member from 1920-1922) were the chief Comintern theoreticians and ideologists until they were liquidated in Stalin's purges. Piatnitzky (member from 1927-1931) was the organizational brain of the Comintern during a vital period of its "contralization" program. Other Russian Bolsheviks in the Praesidium were Manuilski (member since 1924), Kuusinen (member since 1920), Lezevski, head of the Profintern (member since 1926), Moletev (member from 1927-1920), Moskvin @ Trilissor, (member since 1935), and Stalin, who belonged to the Praesidium from 1924.

Of the non-Russian Praesidium members, only Togliatti (Italy), Kolarov (Bulgaria) and the late Zetkin (Cormany) had a long record of membership in the Praesidium.

The last Praesidium, elected in 1935, included the following non-Russian members: Cachin (France), Dimitrov (Bulgaria), Togliatti (Italy), Foster (USA), Gettwald (Czechoslovakia), Koplonig (Austria), Linderoth (Sweden), Marty (France), Ohano (Japan), Pieck (Germany) and Therez (France).

Mootings of the Praesidium took place at approximately six months' intervals, with eleven members considered a quorum. An appraisal of the directing activities of the Praesidium is made difficult by the fact that the Political Secretariat and even field agencies of the Comintern, such as the Mestern European Bureau (see below), issued political directives over their own signature and on the same level with the Praesidium. Lack of conclusive evidence precludes a more precise delineation of praesidial functions, and it will be best to assume at present that the Praesidium and the Political Secretariat formed a tight organizational entity.

1. Politburcau and Orgburcau. The Pressidium apparently functioned through two agencies: the Political Burcau (Politburcau) and the Organizational Burcau (Orgburcau).

a. The Politbureau, the existence of which has been reported by a single source of unknown reliability, may have represented the top working policy leadership of the ECCI, and was reported in 1924 as consisting of five Praesidium members and the Secretary General of the Comintern.

* For a list of members see Appendix C.

Approved For Release 1999/08/24p CtA-RDP78-02646R000600130001-7

b. The Orgburcou, the existence of which is definitely established, consisted, in 1924, of three members of the Secretariat, the chairman of the Finance Commission, the chief of the International Linison Department (OMS), and two Praesidium members. In 1926, it was composed of Manuilsky, Treint, Kuusinen, Smoral, Dimitrov, Forguson and Tegliatti (all Praesidium members and with the exception of Manuilsky and Treint, Comintern secretaries), Piatnitsky, Chief of OMS, and the chiefs of the functional departments of the ECCI (see below). In 1928 the Orgbureau was transferred under the jurisdiction of the Political Secretariat.

In June 1925, a standing Committee on Military Questions was incorporated into the Orgbureau. Its chairman was Bukharin and its deputy chairman Manuilsky and Kuusinen. Other members were reported as Lankky (sic); Berzin, chief of Red Army Military Intelligence; Herbert, member of the Ceneral Staff of the Red Army, and consultant on European and American problems; Voskressensky, member of the General Staff of the Red Army end Far Eastern expert; Dembitzky, Red Army Military Intelligence and expert on military questions concerning Great Britain and India. This Committee analyzed and judged the feasibility of plans for revolutionary military action propared by the sections. It is not known whether it was also engaged in direct everall planning of revolutionary strategy.

2. Standing Commissions of the Praesidium.

In forming decisions, the Procesidium---and through it the Political Secretariat--was assisted by several standing commissions of which the most important was the Political Commission.

a. The Political Commission²--which may have grown out of the proviously mentioned Political Commission of the World Congress-appears to have analyzed the political conduct of individual sections and worked out the proper tactics for each party. In the years 1930-32, for example, a great amount of its effort was spont on the problems of the French Section. In 1933 Luigi Longo (Italy), and Andre Marty (France) were members of the Political Commission.

b. The Trade Union Commission was established in 1926 and consisted of Zinoviev, Pietnitzky, Bukherin, Tomski, Lozovski, Treint, Togliatti, Ferguson, Smeral, Geschke and Nin. In 1933, the Commission was headed by Lozovsky, with Cusev as his assistant.

c. The American Commission, at a session on 26 February 1926, was composed of Robson, chairman; Kuusinen (USSR) secretary; Brown © Braun © Ewert (Germany); Voitinski (USSR); Katayama (Japan); Dzhennary (sic); Manuilsky (USSR); Pepper, @ Pegany (Hungary); Somaren (sic); Thaolman (Germany). At a session of this Commission on 6 May 1929, Stalin called for an open letter in the name of the ECCI to the members of the Communist Party of America, demanding that the Secretariat of the Control Executive Committee of the American Party be altered, and that Levestone, Party secretary, be recalled. In 1933 Kuusinen was chairman, and the following were members: Gusev, © Drabkin, © Davidovich, © Green; Manuilsky; Molotov; and Mikhailov, @ Williams, also Comintern representative to the U.S. in 1929 and 1930.

d. The Megre Commission, in 1926, included the following members: Billings (US); Small (US); Johnson (US), Jonson (Holland); Malakka (NEI) Safarov (USSR); Katayama (Japan); Budenga (sic); Djoss (sic); Bunting (So. Africa).

c. The French Commission, in which Manuilsky played a londing role (1930).

f. The Balkan Commission, appointed by the Fifth World Congress in 1924, was composed of Zinoviev, Trotzky, Braun, @ Ewert (Germany); Treint (France); Muna (Czechoslovakia); Bordiga (Italy); Stewart (England); Valetsky (Poland); Varga (Hungary). At its first session (20 June 1924) the following representatives from the Balkan Sections were present: Kolarov, Dimitrov (Bulgaria); Boskovich, Radich (Yugoslavia); Popescu (Rumania); Maximos (Greece); Dzeli (Turkey).

B. The Political Secretariat.*

1. Structure and Function.

Elected by the Praesidium, the Political Secretariat was essentially the executive agency of the Praesidium, although it also had the statutory power "to make decisions", and the political instructions it issued to the sections were as binding as those of the Praesidium. It appears, however, that in the course of time, this overlapping of functions was reduced to a minimum.

Structurally, the Political Secretariat was headed by the Secretary General assisted by several permanent or alternate secretaries, a clerical staff, and an administrative office (chancellery).

The pivotal position of the Political Secretariat is illustrated by the fact that it controlled, through its secretaries, not only the policy-making activities of the Regional Secretariats attached to it (see below), but also the political-propa and as well as the action functional-departments of the ECCI which were organized on a functional-executive level not unlike the departments of a national Central Committee. In this connection, the ECCI decreed as early as 1926 that each secretary of the Political Secretariat was to "maintain liaison" with such ECCI departments as the Agitprop, Organization, Information, Publishing, International Liaison, etc. In 1928, the Orgbureau was, as previously noted, subordinated to the Political Secretariat leaving the latter's position greatly strengthened.

Insofar as the political steering activities of the secretariat were concerned, some of its tactical instructions to the sections were issued openly via the Comintern and Party press, or by letters and cables. On the basis of a provisional analysis of these published materials, however, it would appear that the bulk of the Secretariat's instructions were communicated through the clandestine channels of the International Liaison Department and the permanent bureaus (see below). Conversely, the Central Committees of the Sections, which were obliged to submit minutes of their meetings and confidential progress reports to the ECCI used the same covert channels for their communications with the Political Secretariat. A comparison of the overt output of the Political Secretariat with that of the Praesidium, indicates that the percentage of published Secretariat instructions was considerably higher than that of practical edicts. The reason for this phenomen becomes evident at least from 1935 on then all known members of the Secretariat were identical with Praesidium members, i.e., Dimitrov, Togliatti, Gottwald, Huusinon, Manuilski, Marty, Piock, Florin, Moskvin @ Trilissor, and Wang Ming.

The fact that Dimitrov, the Secretary General, was elected by the Seventh World Congress (1935) -- an honor previously bestowed only on the chairman of the Praesidium -- also testifies to the increased significance of the Secretariat. As a matter of fact, since no World Congress or plenary sessions of the ECCI were held after 1935, it appears clear that the Secretariat virtually replaced the Praesidium and therefore, in practical terms, became the effective directing center of the Comintern.

Approved For Release 199979084 pctA-RDP78-02646R000600130001-7

Bohind this development apparently lay the realization that a basic change had taken place within the Communist International. Mhoreas-as Pieck stated at the Seventh World Congress-the Communist parties of the world had been more propaganda groups in the late twenties, they were, in 1935, beginning to be transformed into strong mass parties and had developed leaders who were able to decide independently, though on the basis of decisions of Comintern congresses and plenary sessions, the most complicated political and tactical questions of their countries. Accepting Pieck's estimate, the Seventh World Congress accordingly gave the ECCI the following instructions:

"while shifting the main stress of its activity to the elaboration of fundamental political and tactical lines of the world labor movement, to proceed in deciding any question from the concrete and specific conditions obtaining in each country, and as a rule to avoid direct intervention in the internal organizational mattors of the communist parties; to assist systematically in the formation and training of cadros as well as genuinely Bolshovik leaders in the Communist parties so that these parties will be able, at the sharpest turn of events, to find, independently and quickly on the basis of decisions of congresses ... and plenums, the correct solutions for the political and tactical problems of the Communist movement; to render effective aid to the Communist parties in their ideological struggle against political opponents; to assist the Communist parties in making use of their own experiences as well as the experiences of the world communist movement, avoiding, however, the mechanical application of the experience of one country to the other, and the substitution of sterotyped methods and general formulation for concrete Marxian analysis; to ensure closer contact between leading bodies of the Comintern and the sections of the Comintern by still more active participation on the part of authoritative representatives of the most important sections in the day-to-day work of the ECCI".

The Political Secretariat was clearly in a much better position to implement these functions than the irregularly meeting Praesidium, for it had at its disposal adequate machinery (in the form of the Sectional Secretariats) for maintaining close contact with the sections, for the clarification of the political line, and for the training of section leaders, as well as machinery for providing practical assistance to the sections in the form of the Org, Finance and International Liaison Departments.

2. Sectional Secretariats (Laendersekretariate).

The bureaucratic and, at times, academic qualities of the long-distance political steering performed by the Praesidium and the Political Secretariat wore bound to produce friction between the Comintern and the sections, especially the parties which were gradually coming of age. In 1926, therefore, machinery was created in order to provide the Comintern with expert native consultants and to give the sections a voice in the formulation of Comintern policies as well as a training ground for their future londers. To this end there were established under the Political Secretariat, so-called Sectional Secretariats (or Leondersekretariate) which represented consultative working bodies responsible for one or more geographically related sections. The chiefs of the Sectional Secretariats were members of the Political Secretariat and, in some cases, members of the Praesidium as well. Under their direction worked native Communists assigned to the Sectional Secretariats and serving in the following capacities:

- a. Reporters, i.e., highly informed consultants whose advice was sought by the Political Socretariat or the Praesidium.
- b. Representatives of the sections, who looked out for the interests of their parties without, however, having any decisive voice.

c. Approntices who were attached to a Sectional Secre-

It is evident that by this procedure closer political integration could be achieved, between the ECCI and the sections, and the instructions of the Seventh World Congress to the ECCI (noted above) testify to the importance attached to the institution of the Sectional Secretariats, sub-commissions of which were even permitted to draw up their own instructions to the field, Proviousl to the Seventh World Congress, another method of integrating the work of the Sectional Secretariats with the policy-making of the Comintern was reportedly represented by the so-called "Little" and "Big Commissions". These commissions consisted of an otherwise unidentified core of five or six members (Praesidium?) which was enlarged, in the case of the "Big Commissions", by all the Reporters of the Laendersekretariate, and in the case of the "Little Commissions" by one Reporter or the respective Secretary. The exact functions of these commissions, however, are unknown (probably policy coordination), and it appears doubtful that they existed after 1935 when the leading Praesidium members ran the Political Secretariat.

The following cleven Sectional Secretariats were reported as of 1926:

By 1929, however, a reorganization had apparently taken place, and only sight Sectional Secretariats remained:

- 2. Balkan Socretariat for Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Rumania and Groocp.

- 8. Eastern Secretariat for China, Japan, Korea, India, Indonosia, Indo China and Fronch Colonics, Turkey, Falestine, Egypt and Persia.

This broakdown is, of course, not final, and changes in the organization of Sectional Secretariats probably occurred after 1929.

C. The Political-Propaganda Departments.

As stated previously, the Political Secretariat had at its disposal various functional agencies (so called Departments) which served either political-propagandistic or clandestine action purposes.

Among the former belonged the Agitprop Department, the Information Department, the Editorial Board of the Communist International, the Publishing Department, the International Women's Secretariat and the Cooperative Department. Since all these departments were more or less connected with the political aspects of the work of the ECCI discussed in the immediately preceding sections, they will, although of lesser importance, be discussed first, followed by an analysis of the exceedingly important action agencies: the Organization, Finance and International Liaison Departments.

1. The Agitprop (Agitation and Propaganda)* Department

Possibly succeeding a Department of which only the initials O.A.O. (Agitation-Operative Department?) are known, the Agitprop Department was apparently created after the Fifth World Congress (1924). By March 1925 it was well established, and had four sub-sections: Agitation, Propaganda, Press, and Exploitation of Acquired Experience.

In 1934 the Department was headed by Bela Kun. Its functions were to organize the agitation and propaganda work of the Comintern; to direct the activities of the corresponding Agitprop departments of the national sections; to study, systematize and harmonize the practices of the sections; and to train suitable personnel.

The following illustrate the activities of the department's subsections.

a. Aritation Section: In March 1925, this section had initiated several international compaigns, among them the 10th anniversary of the outbreak of World War I, the first anniversary of Lenin's death, the anniversary of the October Revolution, etc. In each case the section had supplied themes for orators and material for the press, giving, however, only general directives with enough lowery for the national parties to adjust the material to the provailing political situation. The agitation Section also had mapped out international Communist holidays for 1926, i.e., Woman's Day, Youth Day, Press Meck, etc.

* The term "agitation" in Communist parlance denotes propagandistic action directed at neutral or hostile groups, whereas "propaganda" signifies training and schooling in Communist doctrine.

 For a table of organization of 0.A.O.--of unknown roliability--see Appendix E.

In 1927 the following international compaigns were carried out by the various national parties with the support of the Agitation section: Lonin Week, Anniversary of the February Revolution, May Day 1927, Tenth Anniversary of the October Revolution, and Tenth Anniversary of the Red Army.

b. Propaganda Section: In 1925 this section whose principal objective it was to "assist the parties in the organization of training courses and in the publication of Marxist and Lenist Literature", had propared a detailed program for elementary courses to be held within local cell organizations, as well as a program for schools on the national lovel. In the Spring of 1925, the section was to begin international courses in Mescew for about 40 students. The courses were to last from 18 ments to 2 years with the objective of training endres of responsible functionaries. The section also supplied theoretical Communist publication abroad with articles, source material, and with criticism. It propared an edition of the works of Lenin in several languages, as well are a bibliography of publications on Leninist theory. The section maintained linison with the Lenin School and the Marx-Engels Institute in Mescew.

c. Press Section: In March 1924 the following personnel were reported as working in the Press Bureau of the Comintern which may have been the predecessor of the Press Section: Chiefs: Kuusinen, Balabanova. Members: Sosnovsky, Nevsky, Frunk, Varga, Ryazanov, Alpari (possibly identical with Marini © Maurie), Landa, Karsky, Salucky, Price, Gerson, Wolfstein, and Kun.

By 1925, the Press Section had furnished articles and pemphlets for the Communist press, and organized the "Rabkor" system of workers' correspondents who furnished the party press with porsonal latters illustrating the class struggle with their individual experience. The section also had organized in Moscow a telegraphic news agoncy of the weekly publication International Press Correspondence (Inprecor) in order to inform the sections repidly of the work of the ECCI and the particular party line in a specific question.* It could therefore be assumed that the Press Section ran the entire Imprecer news service for the extensive use of the national party press. The weekly publication, Imprecer which appeared for the first time in 1922, was an official organ of the Communist International recording the progress and fortunes of the movement throughout the world, including the official Comintern party line. From 1927-1933 it was published in five languages in Berlin (Editor, Pilz). After 1933, the German edition was pub-lished under the title Rundschau Ueber Politik, Wirtschaft Und Arbeiterbeworung by the Universum Bucherei in Basle. The English edition was published in England after 1933, and was succeeded thore in July 1940 by Morld News and Views, a weekly which continues to appear up to the present.

2. Information Department.

The Information Department, reorganized after the Fifth World Congress (1924), was responsible for the collection and dissomination to the ECCI of intelligence concerning the status of the national parties as well as the politico-economic conditions abroad. It was also charged with the dissomination of information to the national sections, concerning the work of the ECCI and the status of the other sections. To this end, "responseurs" for groups of countries were attached to the department. Lieison with the national sections was maintained by special "informers" who were designated by the National Control Committees.

* This tolographic agoncy romains unidentified. In 6a. 1933, the Runag (Rundschau Machrichton Agontur) was established in Zurich and supplied the Communist press with cables free of charge. It is possible that this agoncy was run by the Press Section of Agit-Prop.

The research workers of the department were to supply the ECCI and its policy making organs with the necessary background material, such as party statistics, evaluation of political events, etc. Macther the Department used any "secret" sources, or engaged in clandestine intelligence activities, is not known. It is likely, hewever, that--at least in its early days--it used "overt" material only, such as reports made by the national sections and Comintern representatives; protocols of sessions of the Procesidium, the Orgburcau and the ECCI commissions; clippings from the Communist and anti-Communist press, etc.

In March 1925, the Department prepared

a. Daily briefs, entitled "Facts", containing the most important political events of the day.

b. Special "Reports" on the Communist movement in each country.

c. "Lotter of Information from the Secretariat of the ECCI"; for use of the mational sections.

d. Special projects, i.e., a questionnaire on structure and membership statistics of the Compunist parties and the labor movement abroad; a study of the attitudes of the bourgeois and social-denocratic press toward the Trotsky problem, etc.

The Information Department was also in charge of the library of the ECCI and maintained a reference service for ECCI functionaries, Reportedly independent but possibly combined with the Information Department, was the Economic Information Department under the Hungarian Communist and professor of economics, Varga. This department, created in 1924, had a subsection in the Soviet Embassy in Berlin staffed by Beer, Hay and Aqui.

3. Editorial Board of "The Communist International".

The Communist International a monthly magazine published since April 1919 in English, Russian, French, German, Spanish and Chinese, was the official organ of the ECCI. Its editorial board was directly appointed by the Praesidium. This board is frequently reported as a separate ECCI department.

In July 1924, the menagement of the Communist International was entrusted to Kuusinen, Martynov and Petrov. In December 1924, the oditorial board was composed of: Zinoviev, chief editor; Kuusinen, Martynov, (general questions); Kun, (party life); Pepper, (world pelitics); Varga, (commiss); Smallanski, (laber movement); Humbert-Droz, (Latin countries); Neumann, (Germany); Petrov, (Orient); Stein, (bibliography); Smallanski, (administration).

The measure itself represented - on a higher theoretical level than Inpreser - the official point of view of the ECCI and contained ECCI decisions and directives to the national parties, as well as articles, notes, chronicle of events, etc.

The Communist International was published in Moscow. Its English edition was published by the British Communist Party at rather irregular intervals. A German edition appeared, after 1933, in Zurich or Basle.

In June 1943, the magazine was succeeded by Mar and the Working Class, --published by Trud, Moscow--which appears now under the title New Times in Russian, English, French and German, with overt distribution points thr uch ut the world.*

* For a list of distribution points see Appendix F.

4. Publishing Department.

The Publishing Department was founded in 1925 in order to coordinate the publishing work of the national sections, and in order to render assistance to publishing houses abroad owned by Communist parties, left Marxists or by sympathizers. It is not known whether such assistance included financial subsidies as well as assistance in planning and recruiting of authors. The scope of the work of the department can be judged by a statement in Imprecor (%60, Sept. 1923) according to which Communist literature was published in 40 countries in 47 languages.

Before ca. 1935, the publishing houses most likely to have been supported by the department, were:

5. International Women's Secretariat.

The Internation 1 Women's Secretariat was established in Mescow in November 1920 according to a resolution passed by the Comintern's inspired First International Conference of Women, Mescow, July 1920. The Corman woman Communist Klara Zetkin was made international secretary. From 1921-1924, the Secretariat was subdivided into two departments, one for Western Europe (with headquarters in Berlin) and one for Oriental countries. In 1924, both departments merged. The main function of the Secretariat was to direct the work of the special women's departments created within the Central Committee of the national parties. From 1926 on, it published the International Bulletin of the International Momen's Secretariat of the ECCI in four languages. It organized international women's conferences, and designated March 8th as the day consecrated to the mobilization of women. Before 1933, the "Rote Frauen und Madchenbund" in Germany, led for many years by Klara Zetkin, was under control of the Secretariat.

6. Cooperative Department.

The Cooperative Department was founded in 1921 to direct the work of Communist fractions in non-Communist cooperative societies. It supported the work of the revolutionary opposition within the International Cooperative Alliance, a society founded in 1895.

From 1924 on, the section published a bulletin called International Cooperative Movement.

CLANDESTINE ACTION DEPARTMENTS

自己了你。"胡凌徐浩说一只看着

The three ECCI departments of Organization, International Liaison and Finance provided the basic network of clandestine communications and covert control of the international movement. Their activities illus-trate the actual operational techniques employed by the Comintern in organizing, coordinating and financing the world party. Available evidence on the work of these departments is naturally limited since they oporated clandostinoly -- moreover, their efficient functioning eved a great deal to Ossip Piatnitzky who directed all three departments from the mid-twentics to 1936 and, as an experienced Bolshovik revolutionary, had acquired considerable practical experience in underground work. It appears fairly clear that these three "conspiratorial" departments were connected on a headquarters and field level with the GPU/MEVD and with Red Army intelligence operations, and that through them connecting lines ran to the illegal organizations or apparats of the sections.* The organizational and operational picture on the whole, however, is far from adequate, and the following three sections accordingly represent a highly tontativo analysis.

The Organization (12 Department. tor Cadro) Α.

The overall function of the Org Department--which from 1928 was subordinated to the Political Sceretariat through the Orgbureau--was to onsure the organization of the national parties according to the general principles developed by the Comintern as delineated in the so-called tatut (model statute). This process (technically referred to as Musto the "Bolshevization" of the sections) began in the second half of 1925, with a revision of the then existing statutes of the various national parties in accordance with the newly formulated requirements. In this connection an official document prepared for ECCI members in Moscow (1925) ascribes the following specific functions to the Org Department:

- a. to elaborate regulations for the structure of the gentral and local organs of the party;
- 建新磷的胎儿工作 to organize communist minorities (fractions) in b. non-communist organizations;
- to study and evaluate pertinent reports from the ે નું પ્રત્યેલ કું લગ્ન શું છે. સમાજ રુજ છે. સ્ટાઇટ soctions;
- to supervise the execution of ECCI resolutions perd. taining to the creation of factory colls;
- 11 to supply to control and local organizations as well as to the sections of the Comintern a staff of instructors recruited from among functionaries most experienced in organizational work.

Concorning the machinery set up to achieve the "Belshovization" of the sections, it is known only that the Org Department organized so-called "Organization Conferences" at which the principles of party organization were discussed with competent section percent. organization were discussed with competent section personnel. Org Conference took place in 1925, the second in February 1926. The latter was composed of delegates from the CPSU, functionaries of the Org Department, and special "orgdelegations" from the sections. In the field, the Org Department exercised supervisory functions through so-called "Org instructors" who assisted the sections in their organizational work. Boyond that, howover, the actual activities of the Org Department romain largely unrevealed, and only from a comparative study of Party statutes can its officiety be judged: the pattern of a model statute is unmistakably ovident in overt Communist Party structure to this day.

* These 1116gal apparats were charged with the disintegration and subversion of opposition parties as well as the army and security forces, industrial espionage, the neutralization of hostile or defective elements within or outside the party, the acquisition and storage of arms, the training and organizing of military cadros for revolutionary action, otc. These apparats were independent clandestine organization working parallel Only infrequently did members and officials to the overt or legal party. Only infrequently did memours of the legal party hold positions in the illegal parallels.

The organization of overt-logal Party machinery was apparently not the only concern of the Department. Some evidence indicates that it also played an important role in the organization of the illegal organizations or apparats of the sections.

One Vassiliev, reportedly holding an office "similar to that of a Secretary in the Org Department," in 1930, forwarded (to the Communist Party of Canada) a long detailed instruction on the organization of illegal party work. The document, entitled "How the Comintern Formulates at Present the Problem of Organization", was used in the trials against Tim Buck and other Canadian Communists in 1932, and its authenticity is undisputed.

The connection of the Department with the illegal apparat complex is further, and more convincingly, illustrated by several developments which took place in the early thirties, and apparently placed the GPU/ MXVD in control of the Org Department.

As a consequence of deteriorating Comintern security* and of the factional struggle between the Stalinists and Trotzkyltes and other deviationists, which shock the headquarters as well as the sections of the Comintern, the CPU/HKVD was apparently called upon to take over the security functions for the Comintern and to direct the purge of all anti-Stalinist elements from the sections. It was therefore given a pivotal position in the Comintern apparents and Mikhail Trilissor, Chief of the Foreign Directorate (INU) of the GPU and ECCI Praesidium member under the alias of Moskvin, about 1932 took over the Org Department which by virtue of its close with the Figure and International Ligison Departments was a key control point for the sections. Trilissor transformed the Org Department into the so-called Cadro Department replices of which were organized by all the sections.

The main functions of the national Cadre Departments were the development of reliable activist loaders (Cadres) and the maintenance of physical and ideological Party security. The latter function included the surveillance of Party personnel and the compilation of detailed personnel records, including biographical data on the individual involved as well as his friends and relatives. These personnel records were forwarded by the national Cadre Departments to the Cadre Department of the Comintern in Moscow. There they were used to build up a Central File of all Communists (and Communist sympthizers).in the world.

This Control File of the Comintern became, in the hands of the GPU, not only a powerful political weapon during the period of the purges, but also an extremely valuable recruiting and agent-checking aid for the GPU and its successor organizations, as well as for Red Army intelligence, both of which are known to have utilized extensively the illegal apparats of the sections.

* The Comintern had been penetrated in 1932 by Sochatski-Bratkovski (a member of the Polish Politbureau-in-ordic and an agent for the Polish Government) and by the Hungarian police which had managed to infiltrate its agents into a secret meeting of Hungarian Communists in Moscow.

 In France, such supervision of Party members was reportedly maintained by the Section's Information Department, headed by Duclos in the early thirties.

 Training of apparat personnel, also under GPU-Red Army control, was primarily carried out by the M School in Moscow (see below).

B. International Liaison Department (Otdel Mezhdunarodny Sviasy - OMS)

ONS was charged with the organization of the entire clandestine communications network of the Comintern, an extremely sensitive liaison function which had obviously to be carried out under rigid security precautions. In general, OMS operated in the field through its own installations and personnel, but it also utilized the organizational and operational facilities of Comintern curiliaries. The Conversely, its assets in the field proved valuable to the GPU/MKVD and Red Army intelligence services. The communications network of the Comintern accordingly appears more as a system of shifting personnel and assignments than as a stable bureaucratically self-sufficient organization.

Basically the department was designed to service the Comintern only and provided:

identification papers, equipment, shelter, clandestine meeting places, and transportation for Comintern couriers, functionaries and other personnel;

facilities for the transmission of documents, funds, propaganda material, arms and other revolutionary equipment;

covor addresses, mail drops, safe-houses, etc.;

facilities and training of personnel for the maintenance of international wireless communications.

In addition, OMS collected information on the political views, activities, and personal affairs of Party members in the sections-a secondary party police function which supplemented the functions of the Cadre Department.

1. Headquarters Structure.

Hondquarters of ONS, located in Moscow (and Leningrad?), was staffed, before 1924, with the following personnel: Rudnianski, Chairman; Nazarotyan (@ Mazarotian, Massarotehan), Deputy Chairman; Pavlovich; Rotschein (@ Rotstein); Zeitlin (@ Keitlin); Wilkinson. After 1924 Piatnitzky assumed command, assisted by Abramov @ Mirov, OMS chief for Europe from 1926-1930. In the late Thirties Piatnitzky was replaced by Mildhail Trilisser, chief of the Foreign Section of GUGE/MKVD.

The Department, as such, included a "Control Passport Office" (i.e., a control document forging section), and a section for wireless communications to which a radio school was attached,

The Control Presport Office was, in 1931, headed by one Ryatt, and has been located both in the Interclub at 1.5 Prospekt Ogovodnikova, Loningrad and in the Comintern Building in Moscow.

The Section for Hiroless Communications, headed by Abramov @ Miroy transmitted radio messages to the field and received incoming messages.

The Redio School (also known as Wilson School) which had been created in 1925 by Abramov C Mirov, was located in the Moscow suburb of Metichev and served as a training center for young Communists from abroad who were to be used in the communications services of the Comintern. The curriculum of the courses included the Morse system, the installation of short wave receivers and transmitters, as well as ciphers and codes. For security reasons, cover names were used both by students and instructors; the latter were also employed as radio operators and code clerks. After completion of the course, students were given assignments by headquarters, and were sent abroad (rarely to the area of their native section) where they operated singly, frequently changing their domicile.

* The International of Seamen and Harbor Workers (ISH), by virtue of its maritime communication lines, appeared to have been of greatest use to OMS.

2. Field installations. The headquarters structure reflected itself on the field level (see chart below). ONS was represented in various areas by a field station which maintained liaison with a field branch of the Central Passport Office, and usually controlled a wireless radio station. At the disposal of the ONS chief was a chain of couriers who, among other functions, were charged with conducting functionaries travelling illegally across the frontiers of the country. ONS station chiefs were generally selected from among native Communists who were familiar with the area of their operations, and in several cases a station was run by husband and wife.

In general, it is clear that the OMS field stations serviced the Comintern and not the sections. At least several of the major national parties had their our wireless facilities for communications with the radio section of OMS in Moscow. In the field, OMS stations were attached to the Permanent Bureaus of the ECCI (see below) which used OMS channels for the distribution of funds and instructions.

The following list of identified OMS field stations and field personnel followed by Passport Forging Centers and Wireless Stations sufficiently illustrates the extent and nature of OMS activities throughout the world:

OMS Stations. Borlin:

清

An early Chiof of OMS for Europe, Abramov @ Mirov was roportedly attached to the Soviet Embassy in Berlin, where he served as third secretary under Krestinsky from 1923 until 1927 when he was recalled. The head of OMS for Western Europe in 1940 was reported to be Henry (Heinrich) Robinson @ Harry who operated in Berlin and allogedly was also in charge of the AM apparat. Robinson, an early disciple of Lowin when he had met in Switzerland during World War I, was, by 1930, working for Rod Army intelligence in France and later acted as coupler and Liaison officer between Soviet esplonage organizations in France, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. He was arrested by the Germans in December 1942, and later executed.

In 1930, an otherwise unidentified installation was charged with the smuggling of propaganda literature into Poland.

In 1923, an OVS station operated in Helsinki under the cover of a restaurant supply firm "Koskinon & Niminon" which engaged in the illicit sale of liquer in order to raise funds for the German Communist Party.

The ONS installation at Vesterbrogade 70 was headed by a native Dane, Richard Jonson, who was assisted by his wife and son, Martin. Jonson's organization relayed orders from the Mostern European Bureau to the Scandinavian sections, and provided the usual service (passports, shelter, border crossings) for travelling functionaries. In 1933, OMS Copenhagen was instrumental in moving the files of the Mestern European Bureau and of the International for Seamon and Harbor Workers from Germany to Copenhagen. After the WEB itself had been moved to Copenhagen in February 1933, two Danish vessels - Beira and Jelentha - trading between Copenhagen and Hamburg were mained with Jensen's agents who maintained liaison between the WEB and the underground Communists in Germany. Richard Jensen's chief assistants were Gustav Langfors, Richard Hegener and Julius Vanman @ Kyell Vanmand. In July 1941, Jensen, Vanman and Langfors together with Kay Geil and Alberti Hensen, sailers, Harry Rasmussen, lighthouse keeper, and Elsbeth Mollerup were placed on trial in Copenhagen and received the sum total of 59 years imprisonment. After the liberation of Denmark, Jensen was set free and is new active in the legal party.

Goeteborg:

In 1933, one Harold Svensson--a Swedish customs official and member of the harbor police, living at Jaerntergsgatan, Coeteborg (Sweden)--performed OMS functions and was in charge of constal espionage. Through his contacts on the Swedish liners Gripsholm and Kungsholm, the Western European Bureau maintained communications with New York. Svensson, who held a nominal function in the Swedish branch of the "Friends of the Soviet Union", was assisted by Knut Djoerk (later killed in Spain) and Bertil Berg, a hative of Malmo and Ligison agent on the south coast of Sweden.

Oslo:

In 1932 Dr. Arno Halvorson, a physician, was reported chief of the OMS branch in Norway. He maintained a private residence in a fashionable settlement called Summer's Joy, a clinic at 22 Ackebergsvoien, and a dlandestine office at 2 Carl Johannsgade in Oslo. Both he and his wife, Karin, who was an executive secretary in the offices of the shipowner Wilhelmsen, were secret party members. Halvorsen was in charge of a network of couriers and also of agents engaged in military espionage north of the sixty-eighth parallel. His secretary was one Kitty Andresen. One Martin Hjelmen was his contact man for the Narvik area, and one Leif Foss worked for him in Oslo in 1933.

Paris:

In 1929 the OMS station at Paris was headed by one Roger Walter Ginsburg, architect at 63 Rue de Seine, who was assisted by his wife Doris. Through their offices, travelling Comintern functionaries received their mail, exchanged their passports, obtained funds and safe accommodations in the homes of party members or in the Communist-staffed Hotel D'Alsace, forwarded their reports, and were furnished secure localities for clandestine meetings as well as couriers for border crossings. For security reasons, Ginsburg maintained branch offices in several apartments in adjoining houses, the tenants of which were party members assigned to him. In 1939 the ONS station in Paris was reported still active and engaged in liaison work with Germany through its own channels and not through the border-crossing apparat of the illegal German Communist Party.

Le Havre:

Dunkergues:

The Chief of the ONS installation in Le Havre from 1929 until 1937 was a French schoolteacher and captain of the reserve, Cance, who was assisted by his wife. Their house at 58, Rue Hontmirail sheltered such travelling functionaries as Bela Kun, O. V. Kuusinen, Albert Walter, Andre Marty, Tom Mann, Sirola © Miller, Harry Pollitt, Gusev © P. Green, and others. Cance may have been implicated in the abduction of the White Russian anti-Soviet Leader, General Miller, the traces of whom were lost at Le Havre where a Soviet steamer loft on the morning after the abjuction (1937).

In August 1933, one Marcel Wegscheider, engineer, reported as resident GPU agent, may have exercised OMS functions, assisted by Gustave Huyge, leader of the Docker's Union. Both had offices at 9 Rue l'Ecluse de Bergues (Salle D'Avenir). In 1937, a liaison agent, Manautines, had his offices in the Salle D'Avenir building.

Ligison with England was maintained from Ghent through one Verkeest in 1937.

In 1938, the Piracus office was still active, aiding travelling Comintern functionaries and transmitting propaganda materials.

Peking and Shanghai: Operating under cover of a flourishing import business dealing in German and French wines, perfumes, exponsive leather goods and similar luxury articles, the China branch of OMS in Poking and Shanghai was headed by an unidentified Finnish Communist in 1930. In July 1926, an ECCI organization was reported to exist in Baku for the purpose of maintaining communications with the Near, Middle, and Far East. It was also charged with the distribution of propaganda, the despatch of agents, and with the proparction of false passports and identification papers. The latter function was implemented by the local GPU with one Lazar Rafelevich in charge of the passport department. Members of this organization, S. Wircless Stations of OMS and Sections.

Basle:

In 1942/1943, a clandostino radio station near Basle was reported as servicing the Comintern and OMS/ Switzerland. During the same period the Swiss Communist Party operated its own radio station directly on the French border, near Neuchatel in the neighborhood of Lelecle. This station was directed by an elderly female member of the party, and transmitted political information to France, Italy, Spain, England and also to Moscow from where instructions were received.

Prague:

In June 1941 the German Sicherheitsdienst intercepted wireless traffic between Mescow and Frague, and liquidated a secret radio station in Prague which was staffed by students of the OMS radio school.

Paris and Environs: Botween 1942 and 1944, the French Communist Party operated four transmitters on Moscov and England ways longths, and six other stations within France. Of the latter, one was located near Lille, the romainder near Paris. The transmitters of the French section were under the control of the Contral Committee, and wore occasionally used by several Red Army Military Intelligence agents when their own transmitters broke down. The radio expert of the French Communist Party was one Duval, a mechanical fitter, born in Marseilles, who had played a loading role in the French Communist youth movement and had been a wireless operator on board a French warship. Duval was assisted by one Schwaorzele (sic) who was in charge of the construction of transmitters and receivers, and had a workshop near Paris close to Longjumcau on the main road south of the city loading toward Etampos (Othor reports indicate Lo Pocq as the location of the workshop). In addition, Duval had at his disposal six storage places for accessories in apartments, garages, etc., located in various suburbs of Paris.

Rio de Janeiro: In 1939 the International of Seamen and Harbor workers reportedly operated a radio station in Rio.

3. OMS Relations with the Soviet Intelligence Services.

The connections between OMS and the Soviet Intelligence services, both at the headquarters level and in the field present a complex relationship which will be treated in a separate paper.

C. Finance Department.

The Finance Department under Piatnitzky supplemented the functions of the Org Department by channeling subsidies to the sections abroad, thus providing the necessary funds to parties which could not operate effectively on their own resources. In addition, the Department serviced the Comintern itself, controlling its administrative and operational expenditures and managing its income which was derived overtly from contributions made by the sections, and covertly from subsidies prosumably received from the Communist Party and the government of the Soviet Union.

1. Comintern Income and Exponditures.

For obvious reasons, the transactions of the Finance Department were, on the whole, conducted clandestinely. Only a small segment of Comintern financial activity was revealed in the Comintern press, covering the "public" income of the Comintern and officially admitted subsidies for the sections as well as a few other insignificant expenditures. The following accounting of Comintern income and expenditure for the years 1928-1934 was presented by the International Control Commission at the Seventh World Congress (1935):

Income
Membership Dues*	$6 ,164,5 90 .03
Collections and contributions	407,569.69
Receipts from publishing houses, telegraph agencies and bulletins of press information.	525,2 94.83
Total for 1928-1934	$7,097,454.54

* The sections were obliged to pay regular affiliation dues to the ECCI which they levied upon their members in the form of special dues in addition to the regular membership fees.

Administrative Expenses (maintenance of staff, expenses of upkeep, etc.) $2,576,326.25

Postal and telegraph expenses 197,696.53

Subsidies to party press, pub- 3,966,209.72 lishing houses and for cultural and educational expenses

Travelling expenses	325.559.98
Total for 1928-1934	$7,069,792.48

These figures, correct as they may be, reveal only fragmentarily the scope of the activities of the Finance Department, and it is unequivocably clear that Comintern disbursements to the sections were not confined to press and propaganda subsidies. According to documentary evidence, the Far Eastern Bureau (located in Shanghai), in 1930 and 1931 alone, distributed to the seven sections under its jurisdiction approximately $1,220,000, i.e., a third of the total subsidies officially admitted for the entire period of 1928-1934, and almost equal to the full amount of admitted party subsidies for 1930 and 1931. ($1,712,909.32). Considering the fact that the Far Eastern Bureau expenditures supported only seven out of the 60 sections, dependent on the Comintern, and that subsidies to the Communist party of Great Britain in the early thirties amounted to about $400,000 annually, it is evident that the Finance Department ran a subsidization program considerably larger than officially . acknowledged, and one designed not only to support party press and propagende efforts but also to cover the cost of elections, Cominterninitiated political campaigns, and, last but not loast, the running expenses of the illegal apparats of the sections. In addition to party subsidies, the Finance Department had to provide funds for the maintenance of the Permanent Bureaus (of which the Western European Bureau alone reportedly had as large a staff as Moscow headquarters), field representatives, instructors, couriers, Comintern publications, and training schools, OMS stations, passport-forging installations, wireless communications, as woll as subsidies and operational funds for numerous Comintern auxiliaries.

The exact amount of money handled by the Finance Department is, of course, unknown, but it may be safely assumed that the admitted yearly expenditure average of $1,000,000 was not at all sufficient to cover the cost of Comintern operations. It has been reported that from 1919-1933 the Comintern spont ca. $1,000,000 annually in Europe alone.

The origin of funds to make up for the unavoidable Comintern doficit remains also largely undocumented. In December 1917, the Soviet of Peoples Commissars allegedly granted 2 million rubles for the needs of the international movement, to be placed at the disposition of foreign representatives and the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. Reportedly, there existed in 1922 an otherwise unidentified "Finance Committee", composed of Zinoviev, Solz (ICC), Grinko (State Bank), Dzorzhinsky (Chiof of Choka), and Ossip Piatnitzky, which was in charge of determining the financial policies of the Comintern, and which, on the basis of budget plans submitted semi-annually by the sections, allocated to the ECCI a fixed amount of money as well as sums for such special purposes as election campaigns. Another indirect source of Comintern funds was reported to have been exploited by Piatnitzky who requested that excess profits made by solvent sections out of their commercial ventures be transmitted to other, more needy sections. With the exception of the pro-Hitler German Communist Party, however, which drow a large income from the newspapers and publishing houses directed by Willy Muenzonberg, no section is known to have made more money than it needed for its own expenses.

2. Distribution methods of the Finance Department.

Before Pictnitzky's appointment, the distribution of funds, perticularly to the sections, was unsystematic and haphazard. In 1919, for instance, the German Communist Hugo Eberlein was given some Czarist jowels as a contribution to the German party funds. In 1922, the Greek delegate to the Fourth World Congress, Savgolos, left Moscow with funds for the Greek Communist party but later claimed that he had been robbed by Fascists while travelling through Italy. In the early days of the Comintern Soviet diplomatic installations were used as channels for subsidies without regard to the political implications involved.

Piatnitzky's system was primarily designed to bypass diplomatic channels and to provide for better security. Known in its outlines only, it established the Permanent Bureaus (notably the Western European Bureau) as the main distributing agencies in the field, and utilized OLS channels for the forwarding of the funds which reached their final destination point in the form of cash currencies.

The general pattern of channels is best exemplified by the financial communication lines linking the Mestern European Bureau (MEB) with the Far Eastern Bureau (FEB) in 1930 and 1931. The WEB transmitted all funds destined for the sections under FEB control to the OMS station in Shanghai (which was set up under the cover of an import business firm) in the form of business credits. The OMS station arranged for clandestine, nocturnal moetings of its couriers with the secretary of the FEB who received cash in various currencies. The secretary of the FEB, in order to avoid suspicion, doposited the moneys received in several Shanghai banks on personal accounts or in safe deposits. Subsequently, he with-drew cash which he forwarded through couriers to the sections concerned. Aftor the dispersal of the WEB (which operated in Berlin until 1933), the principle of indirect transmission of funds was still reported in dffect. Subsidios for the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) were doposited in Amorican dollars, Swodish kronor, and French francs in Stockholm, Amstordam and Paris where they were picked up by couriers of the British party. At the same time, it was reported that official Soviet installations were again used as financial channels. The Soviet Trade delegation in Copenhagen transmitted funds to Jonsen, and the Soviet Legation in Prague provided funds for the illegal Czech party (see Permanent Bureaus).

The practice of using official or semi-official Soviet installations for financial communication channels had been reported previously. In 1924, the Finance Department transmitted funds to the Soviet Trade Delegation in Berlin through the Garantie Und Kredit Bank Fuer Den Osten, Berlin NW 7, Unter Den Linden, with instructions as to their disposal. This bank, founded in 1899, was engaged in overt business transactions with the Soviet Union and was reported as the main distributing center for the Comintern funds. No specific dvidence, however, is available, and the role of the Garantie Bank in relation to Comintern finances remains obscure.*

More specific information is available concerning the financing activities of Soviet trade installations in London. In 1922, three 100 pound Bank of England notes, eached in India for an Indian Communist, wore traced back through the Bank of England and Lloyds Bank to the Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank, Ltd., London, as part of a package of 60,000 pounds worth of various notes, and from there to an official of the Soviet Trade Delegation, Nicolai Klishko.

Botwoon 5 July 1927 and 20 November 1927, two employees of the Soviet cooperatives, Centrosoyus, Ltd., in London, obtained 13,796 jounds worth of 1 pound treasury notes from the Mescow Mareday Bank in London by various transactions: they exchanged 5 pound Bank of Englind notes totaling ca. 10,000 pounds; they opened a joint account allogedly for clearing up the affairs of the Union of Soviet Employees, and deposited banknotes to the amount of 1,500 pounds withdrawing large numbers of 1 pound notes; they sold 2,666 pounds worth of dellars to the cashier of the Naroday Bank and wore paid in pound notes; they deposited eight 100 pound notes on a personal account and withdrew pound notes. Considerable numbers of the pound notes thus obtained were traced, within a few days after their withdrawal, to the CPGB and its auxiliaries.

Another case, involving a clork in the Foreign Exchange Department of the Mescow Maredny Bank in London, follows a similar pattern. Letween 27 October 1927 and 15 February 1928, the clork, believed to have been a Comintern financial agent, sold dellars to foreign brears or to the eachier of the Bank. Messengers of the bank, acting under his instructions, exchanged the bank notes thus received against treasury notes of the Midland Bank, the Lloyds Bank and the Bank of England. On 15 February 1928, the clork opened an account at the Narodny Bank, depositing the proceeds of his dellar sales and immediately withdrawing treasury notes against his checks. His transactions involved over 14,000 pounds. Considerable numbers of the treasury notes obtained from the Narodny Bank or its nessengers were traced to British Communists.

It is unknown whether the practices described above were in general use wherever Soviet trade installations operated. It is entirely possible that Pintnitzky established a second channel of financial communications through official Seviet trade installations, and it is noteworthy in this connection, that an unconfirmed ECCI decision in 1931 obliged Seviet trade representatives abread to transmit a percentage of foreign currencies received for goods imported from Russia to native Communist parties, with the adjustment to be made between the ECCI and the Commissariat of Foreign Trade in Mescow.

* At the beginning of 1946 the Garantie Und Kredit Bank A.G. was nowly registered in the commercial register of Berlin with an initial capital of 150 million RI, advanced by the Central Finance Department of the SMA. A former director of this bank, Henry Meyer, was, in January 1946, chief of the Finance Department in the German Central Administration for the Bussian zone.

Soveral reports hint at the possibility of still another distribution channel, From 1921 to 1938, the Banque Commerciale Pour D'Europe Du Nord, Paris, * was allegedly controlled by Comintern representatives. Among its directors were one Curwicz or Curwich, and Willy Muenzenberg, Piatnitzky's appointee as director of all Communist commercial enterprises in Europe. Connected with the bank were a Soviet citizen Godovannhiov and one Charles Hilsum who was allegedly in charge of the financing of the French Communist Party.

In 1938 the house of Seligmann, Paris, was also mentioned as having served clandestine Comintern purposes. However, no precise details are currently available.

In an effort to systematize Comintern spending Piatnitzky requested quarterly reports from the sections to account for the use of Comintern funds, From 1926-1936 the German Communist Hugo Eberlein served as general field supervisor and trouble-shooter for Piatnitzky. His jcb, involving matters of business management and financial transactions required extensive travel which took him, in 1930, to the OMS station in Shanghai. In 1931 Eberlein was concerned with the secret financing of the French Communist newspaper L'Humanite. An advertising agency was set up which accepted advertisements for the paper, but paid out to the paper's management amounts considerably larger than the receipts from advertisers. In 1933 Eberlein smuggled several hundred thousand dollars out of Hitler Germany. Shortly afterwards, he was instructed by Piatnitzky to supervise, organize and finance the printing of illegal propaganda material for dissemination in the Reich. In 1935, he was elected to the International Control Commission, and a year later was arrested in Strasbourg, France. Finally extradited to the Soviet Union, he disappeared in the purges of 1937, together with his bosses Piatnitzky and Abramov & Mirov.

VI. ECCI FIELD AGENCIES AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The basic executive problem of the Comintern and its political steering and clandestine action agencies in hoscow was to translate directives and instructions into effective action in the areas of the sections. For this purpose it was clearly necessary, especially in the amateurish and disorganized '20's to establish directly in the field forward agencies or "relay stations" with sufficient power to impose the decisions of the ECCI on the national parties.

The personnel and activities of these field agencies were, in general, closely ruarded secrets, not only because such Comintern installations represented an encroachment upon the sovereignty of the countries in which they operated, but also because the were in all cases closely concerned with illegal party work. The clandestine character of these field activities has naturally resulted in a great paucity of reliable information on this sphere of Comintern action.

ECCI direction in the field, on a country or regional basis, was primarily achieved through three types of field agencies: Permanent Bureaus, Comintern Representatives, and Comintern Instructors.

Permanent Bureaus, according to Comintern statutes, had the purpose of establishing close contact with the Sections in order to be "better able to guide their work." The sections were obliged to carry out the instructions of the bureaus, even pending an appeal to the ECCI or the Fraesidium.

Comintern Representatives were "especially obliged to supervise the carrying out of the decisions of the World Congresses and of the ECCI." They received their instructions from the Praesidium and its Political Secretariat, to which they were responsible, and had the statutory right to participate in meetings of the central party bodies as well as of the local or anizations of the sections to which they were sont. They were also entitled to oppose decisions which were not in line with their instructions. In 1924 an authentic document mentions two categories of such representatives:

Long-term representatives to the sections, chosen from among ECCI members or other qualified personnel, endowed with the fullest powers; travelling representatives whose task was to visit the various sections in order to supervise and control the execution of (specific) decisions of the Congress or the ECCI, operating under special instructions from the Praesidium and obliged to report to headquarters once a month.

Instructors were dispatched by the ECCI and its Departments to the sections to carry out specific supervisory and advisory functions.

A, The Permanent Bureaus.

Extromoly limited information is available on the structure, activities and personnel of the Permanent Bureaus which, in general, represented the clandestine forward command stations of the ECCI in the field, and through which ran the "illegal" communication lines with the sections and their illegal apparats. Although the Permanent Bureaus were primarily relay points for the Moscow headquarters, several instances have been observed in which the Vestern European Bureau issued over its erm signature and quite overtly (see Inprecer of 1930 and 1932) instructions and directives to the parties in Spain, Holland and Japan. It therefore appears probable that at heast the Western European Bureau acted not only on an executive but also on a political-policy level, on a par with Moscow headquarters.

Approved For Release 1999/08/24 ; GIA-RDP78-02646R000600130001-7

Discounting this political-policy function, the Bureaus may be adequately characterized as regional ECCI field agencies in charge of

a. the transmission of instructions from Comintern headquarters to the sections concerned, and the supervision of their execution;

b. the distribution of clandestine subsidies and the recruitment of trainces for Comintern training centers;

c. the direction of the revolutionary actions of the illegal national apparats.

Five Permanent Bureaus are known to have existed: the Western European Bureau, the Far Eastern Bureau, the Central European Bureau, the Latin American and Caribbean Bureau, and the Balkan Bureau.

1. The Western European Bureau (WEB). Formally established by the Ninth Plenum of the ECCI in February 1928, but reportedly active since 1925, the Western European Bureau was to "maintain close contact with the sections in Western Europe". However, its jurisdiction appears to have extended far beyond the area officially assigned to it and several informed sources refer to the WEB as the nest important advance base of the Comintern in general. Several concrete actions of the WEB support this characterization: in 1931 the Bureau transmitted funds and instructions to the Far Eastern Bureau in Shanghai; in 1932 it relayed instructions for the Scandinavian sections through the OMS station in Copenhagen; in July 1932 it was held responsible for ordering the ill-fated Communist uprisings in Altena, Germany; in 1933 the Bureau communicated with New York via the OMS installation in Geeteborg, Sweden, etc.

Prior to February 1933 the WEB was located in Berlin where it maintained several clandestine offices and employed a staff reportedly as large as the ECCI staff in Moscow (400-500). The headquarters were reported at 131-132 Wilhelmstrasse, camouflaged as the Fuehrer Verlag, and another office existed at 48 Wihelmstrasse under the cover of the Neuer Deutscher Verlag. The Bureau's records and files, however, were kept in various apartments of trusted Communists.

Little is known about the personnel of the WEB prior to 1933. The ECCI Praceidium member Gremet, a French Communist and Municipal Councillor in Paris, was reportedly chief of the WEB in 1927. He was assisted by Togliatti who maintained close contact with the Swiss Gommunist Karl Hoffmaicr and the Italian Ruggiero Griece @ Garlandi. Cremet, believed by the French police to have been in charge of an illegal apparat of the French Section concerned with the procurement of military information, disappeared before he could be arrested (1927).

From 1928 until March 1933 the WEB was apparently headed by Georgi Dimitrov whose personal Secretary was one Magnus, although some sources report Dimitrov morely as Comintern representative to Gormany.

After the Reichstag fire and Dimitrov's arrest in 1933, the WEB was broken up and established its offices in several European capitals.

In Copenhagen, temporary headquarters were located at 42 Vimmelskaftet under cover of a firm of lawyers headed by one Otto Melchier (March 1933). MEB chief at that time was a Communist of Czech nationality, one Walter Ulrich © Lee Ulbricht © Urvich © Sorensen. Funds for the MEB were transmitted through the Soviet Trade Mission in Copenhagen to the treasurer of the Bureau, Richard Jensen. Clandestine liaison with the capitals of Mestern Europe was maintained through one Dictlevsen, boatswain aboard the Danish steamer P. A. Bernstorff which plied between Esbjorg, Antworp and Dunkerque. From Antworp illegal ceuriers on the Ilsenstein of the Bernstein Line maintained liaison with New York contact with which was also maintained through couriers on the Swedish boats Gripsholm and Kungsholm.

The illegal activities of the WEB at this period can be illustrated by the wrecking of the Socialist-controlled Semmen's Union of Sweden in 1933, an operation which was executed by Krebs © Valtin, upon WEB orders and with the help of the illegal apparat of the Swedish section. Krebs accomplished his mission by turning an economic strike into violent mass conflict. Again under WEB orders, Krebs directed Communist units in the Narvik area (Norway) to infiltrate dockers' and railroad workers' organizations in order to lay the groundwork for sabetage action in the event of a war against the Soviet Union. In addition, the WEB prepared and disseminated instructions for maritime sabetage techniques in 1933.

In 1937 the WEB operated nine elendestine offices in Copenhagen, with headquarters situated on the third floor of the Vestpert, the largest office building in the city, camouflaged as a firm of architects and engineers. A. Selve & Co., where a score of typists, translators and guards, allogodly armed with fountainpons filled with tear gas, were employed. Its key personnel in 1937 were reported as follows:

Chief of the Political Department: 0. V. Kuusinon

Chief of the Organization Department: Ernst Wollweber, former Orgleiter of the German Communist Party.

Chief of the Illegal Apparat: Lichael Avatin © Lee Lambert charged with counter-espionage and the liquidation of anti-Soviet elements:

Chief Treasurer: Richard Jonson (see also under ONS)

Chief of a North American Bureau, apparently part of the WEB: Richard Rast, an alias for a Soviet national posing as a New Zealander.

Kuusinon purportedly was not a permanent resident in Copenhagen, but came to MEB headquarters on occasional clandestine visits whenever important business was to be transacted. On such occasions Kuusinen was reported to have lived at 173 Ordrupvon in the apartment of one Petra Petersen, a female operator in the central tolograph agency in Copenhagen.

No reports are available on the activities of the Copenhagen office after 1937. Richard Jensen and several of his assistants were arrested in 1941 (see above, OMS), and Wellweber was arrested in Sweden for his complicity in preparing sabetage actions directed at Axis shipping. It appears probable, however, that WEB functions were later transferred to branch offices in France and Sweden.

An office in Paris had been established at 288 Rue Lafayette in June 1933 on the occasion of the Cominter-inspired "World Congress against Fascism." The connections of this office with the illegal apparat of the French Communist party are thrown into relief by the sabetage operation known as "bataille des bateliers" which was executed by the Confederation General des Travailleurs Unitaires (CGTU) and aimed at disrupting the vater communications linking Paris with Lorraine and the Chaunel const. The operation, which took place in mid-August 1933, was initiated by the WEB as a rehearsal for future sabetage actions.

WEB operations in France after 1933, however, are difficult to appraise. Several agencies were reported as performing WEB functions, but their exact interrelations and relations with the WEB in Copenhagen or with Moscow are unknown.

In 1937 the so-called "Muenzenberg Committee" was reported in control of the legal organization and illegal apparat of the French Communist Party. The Committee, which took its name from Willy Muenzenberg, the well-known German Communist and "eminonce grise" of many Comintern auxiliaries, consisted of a policy-making section under Muenzenberg's personal control, an executive section under Dr. Benedict Freistadt © Bruno Frei © Bruno Freistadt, and a section under Hens Stuckenberger for the infiltration of anti-Fascist groups.

Also reported in 1937 were a MEB branch in Marseilles for work in Italy headed by Togliatti; a sub-section for Porgugal; a bureau at Marseilles, 10 Rue Faucaier, directing Communist activities in North Africa and in the Mear East; and a special committee under Gregori Smolianski, a Polish Jew connected with the Profintern since 1924, for the penetration of the French C.C.T. (Confederation General du Travail).

In 1938 the Eucaronberg Committee disintegrated because of Mucaronberg's expulsion from the Comintern, and was replaced by an "Action Committee", hended by one Subotin, reportedly a CUGB/NEVJ agent and assistant to its chief, and an ECCI momber, Yozhov. According to other reports, Subotin was also an outstanding Profintern executive, and

It is noteworthy in this connection that an "Action Committee" was formed in 1924 as a link between the Committee of 1938, which included G. Smolianski (another Profintern man), was controlled by the Profintern rather than the Committee. Other members of the Committee were the French Communists Frachen and Gitten, Dr. Benedict Freistadt, and, allegedly, a Hungarian Communist Dr. Viktor Farkas.

Muonzonborg himself was found hanged in a forest between Valence and Gronoble in June 1940, probably a suicide. The Comintern emissary who had come to France in 1937 with the mission of ousting Muonzonborg, the Spanish Communist Margariat Welken, was, in her turn, ousted from the Spanish Communist Party in 1941, although during her past six years' residence in Mexico she appears to have continued an active Communist career.

In Synden the WED appears to have maintained another of its many branch offices during the period of its post-Hitler diaspora. A German document Sicherheitsdienst of June 1941 states that the Bureau was at that time represented in Stockholm by the Swedish Communist Rylsdag and ECCI member, Sven Linderoth. Linderoth's organization was principally concerned with infiltrating illegal agents and couriers into Germany in order to produce intelligence on the production of the most recent types of weapons, to carry out industrial substage, and to produce subversive leaflets. Operations had begun in 1939, and the personnel-selected from among German Communists-received special training in Sicherheitsdienst methods from a GUGB/NKVD agent, Dmitr Fedeseyevich Krylov. German members of the network, which was finally liquidated in May 1941, were Arthur Emmerlich; Willy Gall; Rudolf Hallmeyer; and Heinrich Schmeer.

In Czochoslovakia, between 1939 and 1941, WEB functions were apparently exercised by the Soviet Consulate in Prague which, according to the Sicherheitsdienst source, was in charge of the supervision and control of the illegal Czechoslovakian party in the Protecterate. Communist functionaries, trained at the Lenin School, were infiltrated into the area immediately after the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Germans, and maintained contact with the Consulate through one Kurt Beer, a TASS correspondent attached to the Consulate, who transmitted to them propaganda material as well as considerable sums of money. In addition, the illegal Czech apparat maintained direct wireless contact with Moscow (see above under OMS).

2. The Control European Bureau. A series of questionable reports refers to a Control European Bureau with jurisdiction over Germany, Holland, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Iceland, with a subsection responsible for North America, Canada, Australia and South Africa. There is, however, no evidence available to confirm the existence of a CEB.

3. The Far Eastern Bureau. In 1931 the FEB was located in Shanghai and was staffed by eight or nine Europeans and a small number of Orientals. On 15 June 1931 its archives were soized by the Shanghai police, and it was discovered that the Bureau served as the regional Comintern organ for China, Indo-China, Malaya, Jopan, Formesa, Kerea and the Philippines. Communications with the Communist organizations in these areas were maintained by letters, code telegrams, liaison agents, and couriers. Known functions of the Bureau included:

a. The payment of each subsidies allotted by the Comintern to the sections under its control;

b. The harmonizing of party activities with Comintern instructions;

c. The selection, proparation and dispatch to Moscow of students to be trained in the Lonin School, Military School, and Communist University of the Peoples of the East.

Instructions and each subsidies for distribution by the FEB were transmitted from the WED in Berlin to Shanghai through OLS channels. The local OMS station in Shanghai operated under cover of an import business, and its agents usually delivered the each received at elandestine rendezvous at night. For security reasons, the FEE kept its funds--for the disposition of which it was responsible to Berlin--in no less than seven Chinese banks. In the ten months from August 1930 to the end of May 1931, the Bureau disbursed a total of about $420,000 in Reichmarks, gold dellars, Mexican dellars, and yon. Most of its money, however, went to the Chinese party to which the FEE transmitted $460,000 a year as against $50,000 in the other areas under its jurisdiction. The yearly total of funds handled by the FEB amounted to $580,000-- $725,000 including cost of maintenance, communications and operations.

After 1931 the Bureau was reported in Vladivostok from where it moved to Chita (Chita Oblast, USSR). No subsequent information is currently available.

The personnel of the FEB remains largely unidentified. In the early twenties the Bureau was allegedly headed by one Yulin who was succeeded by Voitinski. From 1927-1929, one Charles Johnston, at Latvian connected with the commercial staff of the Russian Embassy in Tekie, was reported secretary of the Bureau. In 1931 the secretary of the FEB, Paul Ruegg @ Hilaire Noulens, and his wife, Gertrud, were arrested by the Shanghai police. Their fate is unknown.

4. The Latin American and Caribbean Bureau. The Latin American and Caribbean Bureau was reportedly located in Montevideo, Uruguay, with the Venezuelan Communist, Gustavo Machado (Morales), reported as an active member. No further information is currently available.

5. The Balkan Bureau. The Balkan Bureau-whose jurisdiction allegedly extended over Poland, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania and Greece as well as over the Baltic countries, the Middle East and North Africa-was initially located in Berlin where it operated under cover of the International Secretariat of the League Against Imperialism. Subsequently it moved to Vienna, the seat of the Balkan Communist Federation, and was suppressed by the police in 1933.

In 1938 a Comintern office, possibly a revival of the Balkan Bureau, was reported in Odessa, with responsibility for Greek affairs. Liaison with Greece was maintained via Istanbul and through the communication office of the International of Seamon and Harbor Workers at Piracus, Greece.

B. Comintern Representatives and Instructors

During the greater part of its existence the ECCI regularly dispatched to the sections its accredited representatives whose function it was to furnish control and to correlate policy, procedures, and action. These Comintern representatives, or "CI reps", reported regularly to the ECCI in Moscow through channels varying with the circumstances and the countries of their assignment. Maintaining close but limited relationships with controlling officials of the various communist parties, they occuri 4 positions of great power and prestige.

As a general rule, although not invariably, the Comintern representatives to a particular country were chosen from personnel not native to the area of their assignment. Some sources have reported that Germans trained in the cadres of the German Communist Party (CPG) were preferred for Comintern assignment in Europe and the Far East. On the basis of such evidence as is available, it appears that the CPG, particularly during the period from 1919 until the carly 1930's, contributed more Comintern representatives than any other communist party, for the obvious reason that during this period the CPG constituted the strongest and ablest of all of the communist parties outside of the USSR.

The exact functions and the extent of control exercised by various CI rops varied with their experience, prestige, and also with the local conditions associated with their post of assignment, i.e., the relative strength and "reliability" of the leadership of the local party. While it is generally accepted that Comintern representatives were dispatched by the Political Secretariat of the ECCI through CMS, it is interesting to observe that their activities in many instances have been closely clifed to, and occasionally integrated with, the illegal apparats of the sections. Since their functions in many countries were conspiratorial in nature, as a general rule int only the activities and movements but the true identities of Comintern representatives were insofar as possible completely concealed, both from the public and from the arises of the local party. The travel of such Comintern representatives was in most instances facilitated by the use of false passports and by the assumption of completely false identities. In many countries, more particularly in Comintern operations in the U.S., Comintern representatives were known only by a single cover such as "Edwards", "Peters", "Johnson". Usually the cover name employed bore no relationship whatover to the national origin and background of the CI rep using it.

Closely related to the dispatch of Comintern representatives to the arious communist parties was the assignment to a Section, under special circumstances or for particular missions, of Comintern instruct-ors. Tasse instructors usually were specialists in a given field, and graduates of Comintern schools, and in many instances had been given operational intelligence and military training as well. Frequently, their function included the specialized implementation of Comint rn instructions or objectives in the field of propaganda, industrial organization, financial and other support to underground communist parties, etc. Instructors dispatched with specific operational intelligonce missions were, of course, controlled by the Comintern. Considerable confusion, however, results in any effort to evaluate exactly the activities of a given Comintern representative, inasmuch as the activities of many of these representatives have been extremely veried both in function and direction. Comintern representatives have frequently been used by the operational Soviet Intelligence Services either for service functions or for specific intelligence missions -- many, as has been noted above, were given intensive training by the operational Soviet Intelligence Services. It is extremely difficult to determine whether or not a given individual at a given time and place actually was serving technically as a Comintern representative or as an agent of another Sovict service. The problem is further complicated by the fact that, in a number of cases, an important GUGB/NKVD or Red Army Intelligence agent has been identified as an individual who had proviously received his initial training and first missions of importance through the Comintern.

Available information is neither sufficiently detailed nor sufficiently confirmed to permit the compilation of a substantial list of Comintern representatives and instructors, together with their missions and the countries of their assignment. However, available information does reflect the fact that practically all communist parties of any importance during the period from 1919 until at least the outbreak of World War II consistently received, deforred to, and followed the instructions of a succession of Comintern representatives dispatched directly to them by the ECCI.

Typical of the development and operations of these Comintern representatives is the career of Gerhart Eisler, which for illustrative purposes will be summarized in some detail. Gerhart Eisler first began to assume importance in the international Communist movement in Germany in the early 1920's when he was active as a responsible functionary of the CPG in Leipzig and Berlin. He became involved in the rampant factionalism in the German party during this period and is believed to have been used by the Comintern in the political liquidation of the anti-Thaclmann faction. Before 1930 Eisler was sent to Moscow by the CPG to attend the Lenin School, the Comintern school for developing professional revolutionaries.

After his graduation from the Lehin School, Eisler's first Comintern assignment was to China where he served as Comintern representative during 1930-1. His precise mission during this period has never been clearly ascortained, but available information indicates that he was dispatched to China by the ECCI as a political representative and "expert". Illness forced his return to Moscow, and for a period of time thereafter he served as an instructor at the Lenin School.

In 1933 Eisler travelled from Moscow to Germany and France, where he embarked for the United States, travelling under a false identity and a fraudulent passport, the origin of which it has never been possible to trace. At this time Eisler had been designated by the ECCI as the Comintorn representative to the Communist Party, U.S.A. (CPUSA), an assignment he fulfilled from 1933 until approximately 1937. During his term as Comintern representative to the CPUSA, Eisler was known only as "Edwards"-his true identity was unknown to all except a handful of high party functionaries. His prestige and authority during this period are known to have been so great that his instructions, orders, and suggestions were accepted without question. According to a number of sources, the highest officials in the CPUSA, deferred to "Edwards" and to other CI reps with complete subservience. During the period of Eisler's service as "Edwards", his possible implication in operational intelligence work on behalf of the illogal apparat was never clearly established, although available information strongly indicates at least some intelligence implication on his part. In 1935, and again in 1936, Eisler travelled from New York to Europe, using a fraudulent American passport procured in the name of a minor member of the CPUSA. On both of these occasions, Eisler is believed to have visited Moscow. In addition to the political direction of the party, it is known that Eisler in his role as "Edwards" spent a major portion of his time mobilizing all possible financial and other support throughout the communist movement in the United States for the support of the German Communist Party in exile. Of those individuals in the United States with whom Eisler was most closely associated during this period, almost all are known at one time or another to have served on operational intelligence missions, either under the direction of the Comintern, GUGB/NKVD (now the MGB), or Red Army Intelligence.

The exact date of Eisler's cessation of activity as CI rep to the CPUSA, is difficult to determine. It is known, however, that in early 1937 he departed from the United States for Paris and for a considerable period of time was active both in Paris and Spain as a Comintern emissary, handling political matters in connection with the Spanish Civil War and particularly with the operations of the International Brigades. Upon the outbreak of World War II Eisler was interned in France, and in 1941, through Communist and communist-controlled facilities in Mexico, he received permission to travel to Mexico City. He was given a U.S. transit visa for the purpose and again entered the United States in 1941 enroute to Moxico City where his destination was given as the residence of an individual long active in Comintern circles, who in the past had served in many countries as a Comintern representative. Eisler was prevented from proceeding to Mexico because of the administrative ruling issued in the summer of 1941, prohibiting travel of German nationals to Latin America from the United States and consequently he was forced to remain in New York City. Almost immediately, he became active in the determination of communist party policy in New York and in the writing of policy-guidance propaganda articles for the party press under the name Hans Berger. It appears highly doubtful that, after his arrival in the U.S. in 1941, Eisler was actually serving technically as a CI rep, but his activity and contacts were carefully conceled and his opinions and suggestions were still treated by Party leaders with considerable deference. It may also be noted that Eisler, from 1941 to the present, has been in frequent contact on a clandestine or at least a "careful" basis with a number of individuals definitely implicated in Soviet intelligence activities.

An interesting example of the dispatch of a CI representative to facilitate a specific operation of a constituent section is provided by the case of Arthur Ewert @ Harry Berger. Ewert had for many years, beginning in the 1920's, been extremely active in the illegal apparat of the CPG, in the illegal Comintern seaman-courier net centered in the International of Seamen and Harbor Workers, and in the training end of the Comintern in Moscow. His last known assignment on behalf of the ECCI involved his dispatch to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil in 1934, under a carefully manufactured identity, for the purpose of guiding and integrating the revolutionary, military organization of the Communist Party of Brazil, an operation which culminated in 1935 in the abortive communist military revolt against the Brazilian Government under the leadership of Luis Carlos Prestes. Ewert's position in connection with this revolt was with little question one of controlling importance as the direct representative of the Comintern, and it is of interest to note that he maintained close connections with Yuzhamtorg, the South American trading corporation of the Soviet government.

VII. NOTES ON TRAINING SCHOOLS

Since the "formation and training of cadres as well as genuinely Bolshevik leaders" was an ECCI function---officially acknowledged only in 1935, but exercised before that date--a review of the principal training schools for foreign Communists in the USSR forms an essential part of an organizational analysis, although no specific ECCI training department has been identified.

A. The Communist University* (possibly identical with the Marx-Lenin Institute. In the fall of 1926 Valtin © Krebs, then residing in Antwerp, received orders from his superior, the German Albert Walter, an active member of the maritime section of the German party and of the Profintern, to proceed to the Communist University in Leningrad. Valtin received his identification papers, money and travel instructions from one Anton in Antwerp, described as the GPU chief in Flanders (Belgium), who possibly exercised OLS functions. Valtin was instructed to report to one Ryatt (at 15 Prospekt Ogorodnikova, Leningrad), allegedly the chief of the Central Passport Office of the OMS. The address given to Valtin was identical with that of the Interclub, an establishment of the Profintern and the Soviet Maritime Unions. Valtin traveled "illegally" from Antwerp to Eschen at the Belgian frontier which he crossed under the guidance of a special border-crossing courier (of OMS?). Entering Holland via Rozendaal, he boarded the German boat Russ in Rotterdam which was carrying iron ore to Loningrad. Before entering the school, the GPU checked Valtin's identification papers, took his picture for his student's pass, and assigned him a cover name. The GPU also requested him not to send letters to relatives and friends abroad by mail, but to turn them over to the secretary of the Interclub for forwarding.

In 1925/26 the Communist University was located in the Uritsky Palace in Leningrad, and was frequented by ca. 6,000 students, the majority of whom were Russians being trained for political and administrative work in the party, the Rod Army, the CPU, etc. Foreign students were assigned to the International Division.

Courses at the International Division-which were located on the second floor of a building adjoining the Uritsky Palace-dealt almost exclusively with practical aspects of class warfare. In a special "Military Department" Red Army officers lectured on street-fighting and the science of civil war. Instruction in photography, fingerprinting and police work was given by GPU officials. Lectures started at nine o'clock in the morning; from one to two o'clock, junior Red Army officers conducted gymnastic exercises, exercises in self-control, and target practice with small arms. The afternoons were usually devoted to the writing of essays and loaflets. Teachers and locturers at the International Division were mostly non-Russians, and included such Comintern functionaries as Kuusinen, Piatnitzky, and the German Arthur Ewert.

Living conditions were primitive, discipline somi-military, and morale reportedly high. The group of fifty-three foreign students to which Valtin belonged lived in segregated quarters--all fifty-three in eight small rooms. Meals, clothing, entertainment, and excursions were free. In addition, each student received fifty rubles every two weeks for incidental expenses.

Supervision of the students was strict, and exercised by a "control bureau" of the Comintern of which Kuusinen was the head, assisted by the German Communists Kuchne, Schneller, and Heinz Neumann. The control bureau planned the curriculum of the students, and also paid their fortnightly allowances.

* Details on the Communist University are available only from the Valtin @ Krebs account (Out of the Night).

Security among the students was maintained by undercover GPU agents who supervised the reading, the conversations, and the personal associations of the students, steered them away from all contacts with Russian workers and students, and occasionally searched their quarters.

No exact information is available as to how assignments were handled for the University's graduates. Valtin himself asked to be sent to the field before he had finished school, and was informed by Ryatt, the same man to whom he had reported upon arrival in Leningrad, that he would serve as a courier to the Orient. It was after this courier mission that Valtin appeared on the West Coast where he was later arrested.

B. The Communist University for National Minorities, located in Loningrad, purportedly also trained foreign Communists. No further information is currently available.

C. The Lenin University (probably identical with the Lenin Schoolsee below) was located in Moscow. A former American communist testified before the Committee of Un-American Activities that he had been a student from September 1931 to December 1932; that his travelling expenses from Detroit were paid by the Central Committee of the American Communist Party; that his living expenses in Moscow were defrayed by the Comintern; that there were approximately thirty American students at the University at the time. Among the subjects he studied were Communist strategy, strike strategy, street-fighting, military science, codes, civil warfare, organization, tactics and nethods of the Red Army, sabotage, and what the witness called "secret service".

D. The Lenin School (probably identical with the Lenin University, and also located in Moscow) appears to have provided advanced seminar work for Communists slated to occupy important positions within their national sections. Students selected for attendance were, as a rule, outstanding party workers who had already acquired some knowledge of Marxist theory as well as practical party experience. Since the majority of then were to become public figures in their parties, they travelled and attended the school under their own names. Students from underground parties alone used an alias.

The curriculum of the Lenin School was primarily designed to provide political education, including such courses as "The Economic Theories of Marxism and Leninism", "History of the International Worker's Movement", "History of the Communist Party of Seviet Russia" and of the "International Labor Unions", "Party Structure", and "Historical and Dialetical Materialism". There were also courses in general history, geography and mathematics, and lectures on revolutionary and civil war techniques. In addition, the students were given basic military training and instructions in street-fighting in order to familiarize them with the basic problems of revolutionary action. These courses lasted from about 3-6 months.

According to several informed sources, this basic course represented only the first phase of Lenin School training, and suitable graduates were drafted for an intensive three months' military course run by the Red Army in conjunction with its Intelligence (Fourth) Department, and designed to train the military staffs of the future revolutions. Graduates of this military course could, in their turn, be drafted by the Fourth Department for a six months' sabetage and intelligence course. Emil Klober (later one of the leaders of the International Brigades in Spain) was the outstanding Fourth Department instructor in this course. A. Finnish Communist, most probably identical with Tuuri Lehti @ Alfred Lander @ Lehen, first husband of Herta Kuusinen, was reportedly a member of the Fourth Department teaching in the military course, as well as head of the M-School (see below) which trained personnel for the illegal apparats of the section.

E. M (Military-Political) School. Operating since 1923-4, this school was located in 1928 on the estate of a former Russian aristocrat near Moscow. Its head was a Finnish Communist with the party name of Alfred who was most probably identical with one Tuuri Lehti @ Alfred Langer @ Lehen, an expert on revolutionary warfare reported as a member of the Fourth Department of the Red Army.

The M School trained foreign Communists to be used by the illegal apparats* of the sections, and gave two six-months courses a year.

F. Miscellaneous. References have been made to a University of the Peoples of the East in Moscow, and a Pan-Pacific University in Vladivostok, both for students from the Far East; and a University of the Peoples of the West in Moscow, with a special department for American Communists.

* Connections between the Comintern and the illegal apparats of the national parties, will be analysed in a separate paper.

VIII. COMINTERN AUXILIARY ORGANIZATIONS

A. General Purpose and Structure.

The leaders of the Comintern early realized the necessity of extending their influence beyond the confines of the Communist movement itself in order to gain the support of members of the left who were in sympathy with "radical" ideas but unwilling to identify themselves with the Communist Party.

0. V. Kuysinen raised the question at the sixth enlarged plenary session of the ECCI (1926), stating "We are first of all confronted with the task of building up not only Communist organizations, But also other organizations, sympathizing mass organizations with special aims....we must, so to speak, create a whole solar system of organizations around the Communist Party, minor committees which would be under the actual influence of our party, and not under its mechanical leadership....."

At the Bighth plenary session of the ECCI (1927), the importance of Buch mass organizations was again stressed: "The Communist parties of all countries must devote particular attention to the work of a non-partisan character which will group in their ranks persons sympathizing with the liberation of the proletariat and of the toilers in the colonies, sincerely hating the capitalist regime."

Willy Muenzenberg, a guiding spirit in the creation of such organizations, described their aims at the Sixth World Congress (1928):....."to awaken an interest in the economic or cultural struggle of the proletariat among millions of indifferent workmen....; to serve as a bridge between us and the workmen.....; to expand the sphere of communist influence.....; to embrace organizationally strata sympathizing with the USSR and with Communism...; to serve as a source for increasing the ranks of our parties with new mombors and with cadres of trained active workers.....".

The communist fractions in such international mass organizations were under the control of the Praesidium of the ECCI and its Political Secretariat. Depending on the power and influence of the Communist leadership, these auxiliaries could accordingly be steered according to Comintern policies.

The auxiliaries varied in character: some were easily identifiable with the Comintern (i.e., the Young Communist International); others were so organized as to conceal their true affiliation (the so-called "Innocent's Club") in order to assist in the promotion of a "united front".

Characteristic of many of these international auxiliaries was the fact that they were frequently interrelated as well as directly linked with the ECCI through series of interlocking directorates. For example, Klara Zetkin, was a member of the ECCI, Chairman of the International Women's Secretariat, Chairman of International Red Aid, and a member of the World Committee against War. Willy Muenzenberg was Chairman of the Worker's International Relief, Secretary of the League against Imperialism, and a member of the World Committee against War. Ossip Plathitzky was an ECCI member and Committee representative on the Profintern.

The auxiliary organizations of the Comintern represented not only vehicles for ECCI-directed political action, but also an additional operational web of clandestine channels for international conspiratorial communications. From a number of cases it is clear that field installations of the auxiliaries cooperated closely with the Permanent Bureaus of the Comintern.

B. Main Comintern Auxiliaries.

The following list of selected auxiliaries does not attempt to be exhaustive and supplies only a few facts on each organization listed simply to illustrate the vast web of international headquarters and national affiliates which, in varying degree, stood at the disposition of the ECCI in executing its political program.

1. The Red International of Labor Unions (Profintern).

Created in 1919 at the initiative of the ECCI, and with headquarters in Moscow, the Profintern was designed as a world-wide federation of labor unions in order to counteract the influence of the International Federation of Labor Unions of the Second (Socialist) International. At the height of its strength, in the early '30's, the Profintern claimed a membership of nincteen million in fourty-nine countries. The great majority of affiliated unions, however, were Soviet labor unions which, through the medium of the Profintern, extended their influence into the industrial field abroad.

Structurally, the Profintern consisted of a headquarters apparatus closely patterned after the model of the Comintern and controlled by an ECCI fraction, and of the affiliated "sections" which in most countries outside of Soviet Russia took the organizational form of "Red Trade Union Oppositions". Profintern headquarters were represented in the field by clandestime Bureaus or Socretariats which resembled the Permanent Bureaus of the Comintern, and actually worked in close cooperation with the latter. In addition, the Profintern organized in the field so-called "International Propaganda Committees" (also reforred to as "International Committees") charged with work among specific trades and industries, such as the committees for minors and metal workers, railroad workers, textile workers, chemical workers, etc.

In addition, the Profintern sponsored the creation of parallel labor union federations, i.e., the Pan-Pacific Sceretariat of Trade Unions, created in 1927 in Hankow, and the Latin American Confederation of Labor Unions, organized in 1929 in Montevideo, Uruguay.

The operations of the Profintern's field installations--which were principally concentrated in Germany--were seriously handicapped by the events following Hitler's scizure of power, and little is known at present about the activities of the Profintern after 1935. From the absence of references in the Comintern press after the Seventh World Congress (1935), it may be assumed that the concept underlying the Red International of Labor Unions was gradually discarded along with its organizational form. Some of the more important leading figures in the Profintern were: Lozovski, Solomona, (USSR), Secretary General of the RLU from its inception, and member of the ECCI and the Presidium of the Comintern; Merker, Paul, (Germany); Mommousseau, Gaston Rene Leon (France); Foster, William Z. (USA); Sobottka, Gustav (Czechoslovakia), Chief of the International Committee for Miners and Metal Workers.

2. International of Seamon and Harbor Workers (ISH).

Croated in Hamburg, Germany, in 1931, the ISH, a direct outgrowth of the Maritime Sections of the Profintern, was designed to organize, on a union basis, the Communist element in the morehant marines and dock areas of the world. Mainly under the control of German communists (its first leader was Albert Valter who was arrested by the Gestape in 1933 and reportedly "turned"), the ISH became the nerve center of the clandestine communications of the Comintern, serving as a useful instrument for OMS in the field as well as an auxiliary for the Soviet intelligence services.

In organizational terms, ISH headquarters directed regional burcaus which were in charge of activities in a group of countries. Rotterdam, for instance, was reportedly the seat of a burcau for Mestern Europe, and a Pan-Pacific Burcau (with sub-stations in Vladivostok and San Francisco) was responsible for ISH activities in America and the Far East. In addition, the ISH organized so-called "Inter Clubs" (International Scamen's Clubs) in many ports which served as propaganda and rallying centers as well as communication channels.

The conspiratorial-revolutionary potential of the ISH is most clearly revealed by its use as a maritime sabetage organization under the leadership of Ernst Wollweber, former German Reichstag deputy and chief of the Organization Department of the German Communist Party, who after 1933 took over the direction of the ISH conter in Copenhagen and organized sabotage operations against Axis vessels in Scandinavian waters. Wollweber was aprosted by the Swedish police in 1941 and sentenced to three years of hard labor, and after his release, on 15 November 1944, he proceeded to the Soviet Union.

3. Young Communist International. The Young Communist International, which was created in 1919 in Borlin and whose headquarters were subsequently transferred to Mescow, represented an international federation of Communist youth organizations in the USSR and abread, and was given the status of a section of the Community general of the YCI, V. Chemodanov, was elected a member of the ECCI in 1935, and had previously held offices in the Praesidiar of the Community.

The headquarters organization of the YCI paralleled the political steering complex of the Comintern. The constituent units of the YCI were formed by Young Communist Leagues or Unions in countries outside of Soviet Russia, and by the All-Union Lenin Communist League of Youth (Konsonel) in the USSR.

In 1935, official Comintern statistics placed the strongth of YCI nonbership at 3,759,000 in the USSR and at 221,000 in foreign countries.

In functional terms, the YCI which, on the national level was controlled by the directing agencies of the sections, served to replenish the endres of the national parties from the younger generation and formed a useful instrument in the struggle for control of non-Communist youth.

4. Educational Worker's International (EWI). The EWI aimed at bringing members of the teaching profession and teachers unions under Communist control. It was not immediately recognizable as a Comintern auxiliary since it accepted both organizations affiliated with the Comintern and unions belonging to the Second International. However, its headquarters organization in Paris (1935) was controlled by the Communist Leon Vernochet, Secretary General of the EWI. The most significant among the unions affiliated with the EWI was the All-Russian Federation of Educational Workers. By the end of the '20's, the EWI had established sections in many countries of Europe and North America. In China, EWI aims were apparently pursued by the Pan-Pacific Secretariat of Trade Unions under Earl Browder and Appletin who had been members of the EWI. In Latin America, Vernochet organized groups of "Friends of the EWI" (1928). Apparently connected with the EWI was the International Pedagogical Institute, founded in Moscow in 1932, reportedly designed as a training center for EWI leaders.

5. Red Tensants' International (Krestintern). The Krestintern was founded in 1923 in Moscow, and was directed by its Secretary General, I. A. Teodorovich. Charged with the task of breaking the resistance of the international peasantry against communist ideology, the Krestintern apparently had little success. In 1926, an International Agrarian Institute was established in Moscow in conjunction with the Krestintern.

6. Red Sports International (Sportintern). Created at an international congress in 1922 in Mescow "for the purpose of uniting the world proletarian sports novement and directing it along the path of the revolutionary class struggle", the Sportintern was directed by an Executive Comnittee in Mescow which operated through a Bureau, composed of representatives from the national sections and from the Comintern, Profintern, Young Communist International and the International Women's Secretariat of the ECCI. Under the main bureau operated regional bureaus, i.e., a bureau in Berlin with jurisdiction over Sportintern affairs in Germany, England, France, Holland, Belgium, Finland, Scandinavia, Austria and Luxemburg; and a bureau in Frague for Czechoslovakia, Italy, Yugoslavia, Poland, the Belkan countries, and North America. The two latter bureaus were probably wipod out after 1933.

The national socilons (sport federations) of the Sportintern were organized as auxiliaries of the sections and were controlled by the respective parties and sections of the YCL.

The function of the Sportintern was not only propagandistic, but was conceived as a potential action component of class struggle which necessitated the training of militant and military leaders. The Contral Institute for Physical Culture in Moscow assisted in the training of members of the national sections of the Sportintern.

7. International Union of Proletarian Freethinkers (IPF). Practically an extension of the Union of Militant Atheists of Soviet Russia under E. Yaroslavski, the IPF was an instrument of "revolutionary atheism". The organization was established in 1925 in Berlin, where it had its headquarters until 1932. In 1934, the IPF claimed branches in twenty-four countries outside of Soviet Russia--sixteen in Europe, four in America, three in Asia, and one in Australia.

8. International Juridical Association. Organized by the German Communist Lawyers, Alfred Appel and Fritz Loewenthal at the International Juridical Conference in Berlin (1930), the association was designed to expose "class legislation" (Klassenjustiz), and to draw sympathizing elements of the legal profession into its fold. The headquarters, a General Secretariat, was originally located in Berlin, but subsequently moved to Zurich and from there to Brussels (1933).

The activities of the association were chiefly the provision of free logal aid to prominent Communist figures, reportedly paid for by the Comintern, and protest compaigns connected with the treatment of Communists by their respective governments. In 1931 a Swiss number of the association defended Paul Ruegg @ Hilaire Noulons, Secretary of the Far Eastern Bureau, who had been arrested by the Chinese police. In 1933 the association appointed an "International Legal Commission" which staged a counter trial in London to the Reichstag Fire trial then proceeding in Leipzig. In 1934, the association demanded the release of political prisoners from the Spanish Enbassy in Paris.

9. Worker's International Relief (WIR). The offspring of an organization created to alleviate famine conditions in the USSR, the WIR (or Mozhabpom) was organized upon the initiative of the ECCI in Berlin in 1921 as an international relief organization mainly for the aid of strikers and locked-out workers in capitalist countries.

Directed by an International Secretariat (located originally in Derlin, and, from 1933, in Paris) which was headed by the German communist and master organizar of communist front organizations, Willy Muenzenberg, the various national branches of WIR were controlled by national committees which included non-communists but were usually directed by a communist secretary.

The functions of the WIR, although charitable in appearance, were conspiratorial in essence since the aid given to striking workers served mainly to transform economic strikes into political-revolutionary action. Muchaenerg himself announced in 1932 that the abolition of capitalism was more important than relief activity per se.

The activities of the WIR consisted mainly in the collection of funds (from 1921-1931 WIR collected and disbursed about $16,900,000). In addition, the organization branched out into film production and the publication field as a means of obtaining funds. Through the distribution channels of WIR, however, flowed not only relief noncy but also clandestine party funds, especially to countries where the party was illegal.

10. International Red Aid (IRA). Also known as International Class War Prisoner's Aid, and as MOPR in the USSR, IRA was created about 1922 as a complement to the WIR, and was characterized as the "Red Cross of the Communist International", designed primarily to assist political prisoners and other "victims of bourgoois reaction."

Organizationally, IRA was controlled by an Executive Committee in Moscow composed of representatives from the constituent branches of IRA abroad, which in their turn were controlled by National Cornittees consisting of non-corrunists and a corrunist secretary. For practical purposes, IRA was controlled by Willy Muchaenberg, its International Secretary.

IRA functioned in almost every country where a communist party existed. In 1932, according to a Soviet source, IRA operated in sixty-seven countries, partly on a legal basis, and partly illegally (in thirty-six countries). There are some indications that IRA has continued to operate underground in several countries up to the present,

11. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries (VOKS). Designed to promote Seviet culture abroad as an instrument of political propaganda, the All-Union Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries (known in the Seviet Union in abbreviated form as VOKS) was established in Moscow in 1923, and continues to be active to this day. The branches of the society (thirty-eight were reported in 1930) were normally called Societies for Cultural Relations with Soviet Russia, and were in contact with the Moscow headquarters through local VOKS representatives usually attached to the official diplomatic Soviet representation in the country concerned.

The activities of VOKS can be gauged from the sections of its headquarters, i.e., Foreign Relations, Reception of Foreigners, International Book Exchange, Press, and Exhibitions. VOKS was linked with the Comintern through the Agitprop Department of the ECCI which determined the scope and line of its propaganda activities.

12. Friends of the Soviet Union. Created under VOKS auspices in Moscow in 1927 as an outlet of pro-Soviet propaganda aiming especially at non-Communist labor groups abroad, the organization was headed by an International Committee or Europa under the direction of Willy Muenzenberg in Berlin from where it moved (1933) to Amsterdam. The various national branches of the organizations (twenty-seven were reported in 1934) were directed by a national Committee composed of a communist secretary and noncommunist nombers.

FSU, among its other propagandistic activities, organized trips of non-communist workers' delegations to the USSR as a means of proselytizing. In this respect, FSU acted as an instrumentality of the All-Union Contral Council of Labor Unions, and indirectly of the Profintern.

13. International Union of the Revolutionary Theatre. Created in 1925 in Moscow where its International Secretariat was located, this organization aimed at the utilization of theatrical media for political propaganda purposes. National branches existed in several countries of Europe, America and Asia, and were directed by a communist organizer and a non-partisan committee. The organization possessed some significance as a means for the political ponetration of the entertainment field.

14. International Union of Revolutionary Writers. Organized in 1925, probably under VOKS auspices, the organization aimed at the utilization of sympathetic elements among the literati abroad for the promotion of pro-Soviet and especially anti-fascist and anti-war theres.

15. International of Revolutionary Paintors. Similar in purpose to the International Union of Revolutionary Writers, this Comintern auxiliary was directed by the Hungarian Communist, Bela Vits.

16. International Music Bureau. Established at an international music conference in Moscow in 1992, the Bureau's task was to introduce revolutionary ideology into music. Hanns Eisler, brother of Gerhart Eisler, was reportedly a leading figure in the Bureau.

17. International Association for Medical Ties between the USSR and Foreign Countries. Probably organized by VOKS in ca. 1929, the organization festered the exchange of information between numbers of the medical profession in the USSR and abroad, organized visits of foreign delegates, and propagated "socialized medicine".

18. International of War Veterans and War Victims. Founded in 1920 in Geneva, under the chairmanship of Henri Barbusse, the organization propagandized sympathetic veterans of World War I with a view towards proventing another war, especially an intervention against Soviet Russia. In 1930 the organization claimed a membership of 1,000,000.

19. League Against Importalism (LAI). Created in 1927 at a congress in Brussels by Willy Muchzenberg and his assistant, Louis Gibarti © Ladislaus Dobos, the LAI replaced the League for Struggle of Colonial Oppression, and became an "Innocents' Club". It served as a rallying point for anti-Imperialist national revolutionary movements, i.e., in India, Indo-China, the Near East, etc., and premoted the Soviet Union as a champion of the liberty of colonial peoples.

The LAI was composed of an International Congress, a General Council, an Executive Committee, and International Secretariat, a Control Commission, and a series of national branches. The International Secretariat, headed by Willy Muenzenberg, was located in Berlin, from where it moved temporarily to Paris and finally--in 1934--to London.

20. World Cormittee Acainst Mar and Fascism. Created in 1932 at a Congress in Amsterdam which had been organized by the Western European Bureau, the World Committee (hq. Paris) was primarily designed to direct public opinion against any aggresser against the Soviet Union--notably against the rising threat of the Fascist powers--and to pronote noninterventional pacifism.

Although many members of the World Committee were non-Communists, its control was in the hands of such Communists as Willy Mucnzenberg, Henri Barbusse, and Guy Jorran, who were reportedly taking directions from the Political Commission of the Committern.

21. International Rolief Committee for Victims of Hitler's Fascism. This committee (founded before 1933) was succeeded by the Relief Committee for the Victims of Fascism in 1933, and was mainly directed by Louis Gibarti, probably from Paris.

22. Miscellaneous: The All Slav Committee. Anti-Fascist Committee of Soviet Women. Anti-Fascist Committee of Soviet Youth. and Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee were organized before the dissolution of the Committee, but there are no indications that they were directly integrated into the ECCI They have continued their activities to the present in a reasonably public fashion.

IX. DISSOLUTION OF THE COMINTERN

On 15 May 1943-six nonths after the liberation of Stalingrad, five days before the arrival in Moscow of President Roosevelt's personal representative, Joseph Davies, and in the same month that GUGB (Central Directorate of State Security) was transformed from an NKVD directorate into an independent commissariat (NKGB)-the Praesidium of the ECCI arrived at the decision to dissolve the Comintern, and announced (Moscow radio, 10 June 1943; Pravda and Izvostia, 10 and 11 June 1943) that 31 out of the 76 sections affiliated to the Comintern at the time of the Seventh World Congress had approved the dissolution. The Liquidation resolution was signed by the following twelve Praesidium members:

As an expression of their concurrence, the following leading Communists also affixed their signature. Bianco (Italy), Dolores Ibarruri (Spain), (Inkeri?) Lehtinen (Finland), Anna Pauker (Rumania), and Matyas Rakosi (Hungary). The sections approving the dissolution were listed as follows;

The Communist Party of the USA was not included because this section had left the Comintern in 1940.

IIn order to accomplish the "practical liquidation of the affairs, organs, apparatus, and property of the Communist International", a so-called Liquidation Commission, composed of Dimitrov, Manuilski, Pieck and Togliatti, was appointed. According to a reliable source, the Liquidation Commission cooperated closely with V. N. Merkulov, then Peoples Commissar of the NKGB, S. N. Kruglov, then vice-commissar of the NKVD, and Colonel General Appolonov, vice-commissar of the NKVD.

The liquidation of the Comintern was arrived at by unconstitutional means since only the World Congress was empowered to "decide...organizational questions" and "to alter the program and the rules of the Comintern". Post facto ratification of the dissolution decree by the individual sections similarly was a procedure not allowed for in official Comintern statutes. The scope of the liquidation itself was also rather hazily formulated. While, for example, the dissolution of the ECCI, together with its Praesidium, Scerethriat and the International Control Commission, was decreed expressis verbis, no mention was made of the Sectional (Laender) Sceretariat, the Permanent Bureaus, the functional departments of the Political Sceretariat, the Institution of Comintern representatives, and of the Comintern auxiliaries. Neither were the sections explicitly relieved of their obligations under the 21 Conditions of Admission which included the duty to aid Soviet Russia, to maintain illegal apparats, etc.

Whatever the tactical or propagandistic value of announcing the dissolution of the Comintern in May 1943, in organizational terms the ECCI and its subordinate departments and agencies were effectively dissolved. Parts of the Comintern executive staff structure in Moscow were liquidated before 1943; i.e., the plenary sessions of the ECCI and the World Congresses; others had, by the middle of the war, clearly outlived their usefulness; and others, finally, were apparently atsorbed by departments of the Soviet government and of the CPSU in Moscow. For the moment, therefore, it may be accepted that the Praesidium of the ECCI stated a fact when it announced in May 1943 that "the experience accumulated by the Communist International convincingly showed that the organizational form of uniting workers chosen by the First Congress had been outgrown."

This major organizational shift, however, clearly had little effect upon the efficient coordination and control of the international Communist movement. The functions of the old Comintern which were still of importance were simply carried out by less formal and less centralized means. What happened to the Comintern's political direction apparatus and its clandestine action agencies, and the methods by which the international Communist movement was directed and coordinated after May 1943 will form the subject of a separate analysis.

Judging from (probably authentic) instructions of 27 March 1924, signed by the Secretary General Kolarov, the deputy chairman of OMS, Nazarotyan, and the deputy chairman of OAO, Manuilski, OAO maintained close liaison with, and directed the personnel in charge of agitation work within the sections. Such personnel, assigned to a specific field job, was obliged to conceal any connections with the local party. The agitator in question did not have the right to appear at public party meetings as a speaker, although secretly, he directed and supervised the local party press and agitation activities. His functions included penetration and subversion of hestile groups, especially (military circles, as well as collection of political intelligence on groups and individuals inimical to Cornunism.

Liaison between the agitator and OAO was to be carried out by local party organs exclusively. For this purpose a special courier system was to be organized, which apparently forwarded the agitator's reports to collection points designated by OAO or OMS. The efficiency of OAO and its specific operational methods cannot be judged for lack of evidence.
