Recent Soviet Bloc Military Developments

I. Some Soviet Bloc military activities since early April 1955 have flaunted Soviet armed strength, probably in an effort to show that the Bloc approaches SUMMIT conference in July from a position of strength, while others have apparently been designed to support Soviet diplomatic policy of "reasonableness" in international affairs.

A. Display of strength has included:

1. Fourteen "practise fly-by's" in the Moscow area since 1 April, displaying latest Soviet bomber and fighter aircraft. (Note apparent postponement of annual Aviation Day show from June until unannounced date in July).
2. Publicity build-up and announcement of Warsaw Treaty of 14 May, professing "anti-NATO" aspect of Bloc military coalition.

B. Display of "reasonableness" may include:

1. Preparations for withdrawal of Soviet troops from Austria, [redacted]

3. Continued postponement of formal creation of East German Army in

14 May "anti-NATO" treaty.

II. Shooting of US reconnaissance aircraft in Bering Sea area on 22 June does not clearly fit one or the other of above patterns, but Molotov's unusual expression of "regret" and offer of part payment indicates desire to minimize incident and demonstrate Soviet "reasonableness"

III. Other recent Bloc military developments, not publicly advertised, show that despite current disarmament proposals and campaign to relax international tension, Soviets continue strenuous efforts to maximize Bloc fighting capabilities.

A. Improvement of offensive air power, including:

1. Continued rapid re-equipment of Soviet long range units with jet bombers (Spring '55)
