1. In August 1953 the First Municipal Middle School was the most completely equipped middle school in Nanking. Persons arriving in Nanking from the USSR or the satellite countries who were interested in schools usually inspected the First Municipal Middle School. There were two classes with Soviet instructors for Overseas Chinese studying the Russian language at the school.
2. In addition to their classes, students at the school were required to attend a daily current events discussion directed by their teachers and dealing with the writings of MAO Tse-tung and information issued by the New China News Agency.¹
3. All students attending the school were members of the New Democratic Youth Corps. Other organizations in the school were the Sino-Soviet Friendship Association and the Students' Association.

1. ☐ Comment. In general the students disliked these meetings because they had sufficient work to do in preparing their regular school assignments.
