

CONFIDENTIAL
ASSOCIATED CLASSIFIED

25X1A

The Western Sahara Conflict: Morocco's Millstone

An Intelligence Assessment

Secret

PA 79-10167
April 1979

25X1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

National Foreign Assessment Center

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

The Western Sahara Conflict: Morocco's Millstone (s)

An Intelligence Assessment

Research for this report was completed on 23 March 1979.

This assessment was prepared at the request of and coordinated with the National Intelligence Officer for the Near East and South Asia.

25X1
25X1A

25X1A

Secret

25X1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

The Western Sahara Conflict: Morocco's Millstone (s)

Key Judgments

Morocco has lost the initiative in its effort to maintain its hold on the former Spanish Sahara in the face of unrelenting harassment by the guerrillas of the POLISARIO Front. The tide of war is running in favor of the POLISARIO, and we do not believe that Morocco will be able to reverse this trend as long as the flow of military supplies from Algeria continues and the Algerian safehaven for POLISARIO guerrillas is maintained. The Moroccan problems have been compounded by Mauritania's withdrawal from the fighting, allowing the guerrillas to concentrate their offensive against the Moroccan-administered sector of the Western Sahara.

POLISARIO's 3,000 to 5,000 combatants are exploiting the tactical advantages of the sparsely populated desert terrain, and while they probably cannot drive the Moroccan Army out of the Western Sahara, they can probably make the price of staying there unacceptable to Morocco.

King Hassan won popular support by his 1976 annexation of Morocco's portion of the Western Sahara, but since then the cost in men and resources has become a political liability. A political settlement is badly needed, but he would lose considerable prestige  if he were to back down on his claims.

Algeria's new leadership has not slackened from the late President Boumediene's commitment to the cause of Western Saharan nationalism. Algeria continues to refuse to recognize the Moroccan-Mauritanian annexations and provides the POLISARIO guerrillas sanctuary and material support. There appears to be little immediate prospect of a negotiated settlement to this conflict without the prodding of outside mediation.

Several developments in the dispute seem plausible over the next few years:

- Growing domestic opposition to the war in Morocco may within a year or so seriously weaken Hassan's negotiating position. In the absence of negotiations, political, economic, and military constraints will probably keep the conflict from escalating into a conventional war.
- The POLISARIO will continue to move at will through the countryside, scoring occasional military successes and inflicting heavy casualties on Moroccan forces. Some guerrilla attacks—notably those in southern Morocco proper—will have considerable propaganda value. For their part, Mauritanian forces will continue to honor their cease-fire with the guerrillas and may pull out of their sector altogether.
- Buoyed by the guerrillas' battlefield successes, Algeria and the POLISARIO may become less and less disposed to compromise. A political settlement would most likely have to take the form of Moroccan acknowledgment of Saharan self-determination and territorial concessions to the new Saharan state.
- If a Saharan ministate were created in the Mauritanian sector, such an arrangement would be unstable. POLISARIO leaders would view their ministate as a liberated zone from which they would continue their insurgency in the Moroccan Sahara. They would turn to Algeria for military support when threatened by Morocco.
- Most countries have not acknowledged the partition of the Sahara between Morocco and Mauritania, and the POLISARIO's government-in-exile will slowly gain broader recognition.

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

- Costly and embarrassing attacks from Algerian-based POLISARIO guerrillas seem likely to continue, and King Hassan may be pressured into a more aggressive policy toward Algeria. Given the military balance, which is greatly to Morocco's disadvantage, Hassan is likely to restrict cross-border operations to commando raids that carry minimal risks of drawing a major response from Algerian regular forces, but also afford only minimal promise of slowing the insurgency.

25X1

25X1

The Western Sahara Conflict: Morocco's Millstone (S)

After more than three years of conflict, Morocco's military capability to fight an effective counter-guerrilla war has been seriously eroded. Moroccan forces are increasingly defensive minded and show little ability to detect and respond to concentrations of POLISARIO forces.

in order to maintain the current level of pressure on Moroccan troops. The guerrillas would have to scale down their operations considerably if these supplies were reduced or cut off. The loss of Algerian military support would not mean the end of POLISARIO resistance, but it would probably be reduced to a level that could be contained by the Moroccan forces.

25X1

25X1

POLISARIO Front Political Orientation

The POLISARIO forces are well armed and supplied. They have not yet attempted to occupy and hold territory, preferring to operate from bases in Algeria and thereby deny superior Moroccan forces a fixed target. The POLISARIO probably hopes that a protracted guerrilla war will force Rabat to accept a political settlement creating an independent Saharan state.

The POLISARIO Front (The Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro)¹ was formed in May 1973 by members of its predecessor organization, the Saharan Liberation Front, a guerrilla movement that opposed Spanish control of the territory.² The POLISARIO's goal, enunciated at its second congress in 1974, is the establishment of an independent, nonaligned, socialist Arab republic. In their drive for independence, POLISARIO militants have mobilized and politicized large numbers of Saharans and conducted an effective public relations campaign. More important, the POLISARIO has grown in the past five years—with strong Algerian backing—from an insignificant band of fighters into a well-organized and equipped force that has driven Mauritania from the war and forced Morocco into a defensive posture. It has become a relatively independent political and military force that will have to be reckoned with in any future settlement of the Saharan dispute.

25X1

POLISARIO Military Advantages/Limitations

The guerrillas continue to take advantage of their ability to move virtually at will through southern Morocco, Mauritania, and the Western Sahara. They also have benefited from the 10 July coup in Mauritania, which has resulted in a cease-fire in Mauritania and the Mauritanian-controlled section of the Sahara and allowed the POLISARIO forces to enhance their logistic capability through the establishment of additional base camps. Since the coup in Mauritania, Moroccan casualties have increased to about 100 men killed per month. Moroccan troops based in Mauritania are not expected to undertake offensive operations against the POLISARIO forces.

The majority of POLISARIO partisans are Reguibat tribesmen, probably the most powerful of the Saharan peoples.³ They traditionally have followed a nomadic ¹ Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro were the former names of the two regions comprising the Spanish Sahara. The acronym is derived from the Spanish translation Frente Popular para la Liberacion de Saguia el Hamra y Rio de Oro.

25X1

The POLISARIO lacks the manpower base to pursue anything other than a guerrilla strategy. POLISARIO's objective is not to defeat the Moroccans, but to force them to the bargaining table or to withdraw. The guerrilla forces are dependent on military aid primarily from Algeria, and to a lesser extent from Libya,

CPYRGHT

Guerrillas in Land Rovers departing for mission in Western Sahara.

Confidential ©

lifestyle, ranging with their camels across wide expanses of northwest Africa. They are known for their ferocity, pride, and skill with firearms and have dominated the eastern part of the territory for some time. [redacted] tary approach as the only effective means of achieving independence. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

[redacted] tentative conclusions on its political orientation, ideology, and objectives. The key figures are single-minded young men in their thirties who seem prepared to fight as long as necessary to achieve independence. [redacted]

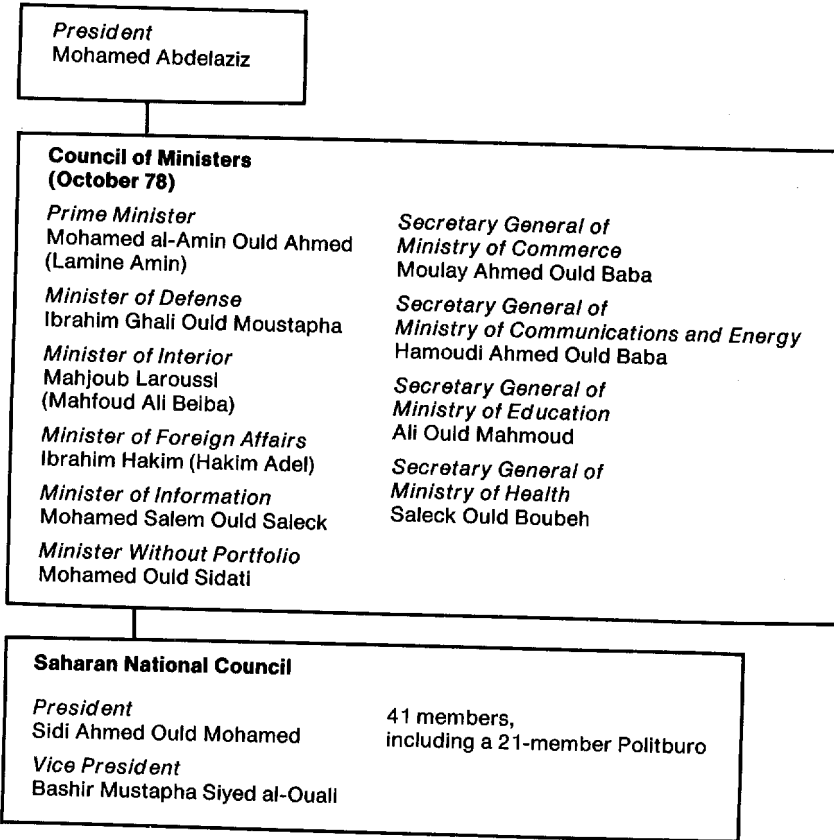

4 The dominant ideological orientation within the POLISARIO leadership reportedly is Arab nationalism. Secretary General Mohamed Abdelaziz and most influential POLISARIO leaders stress non-Marxist Arab socialism and unity, the fight for independence, and nationalism as the main features of the POLISARIO struggle. POLISARIO leaders advocate a hardline mili-

5 The POLISARIO Front has been concentrating on strengthening its shaky political credentials while conducting guerrilla operations against Morocco and, until last July, Mauritania. In February 1976 the POLISARIO Front announced the creation of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic, in effect, a government-in-exile. The SDAR consists of a skeleton cabinet of little-known figures and a legislative council. The Front, however, is the dominant authority. A [redacted]

25X1

Saharan Democratic Arab Republic (SDAR)

Figure 1

Countries That Recognize the SDAR

	Date
Algeria	3-6-76
Angola	3-11-76
Benin	3-9-76
Burundi	2-29-76
Congo	6-2-78
Equatorial Guinea	11-3-78
Ethiopia	2-24-79
Guinea-Bissau	3- -76
Madagascar	3- -76
Mozambique	3- -76
North Korea	3-16-76
Panama	7- -78
Rwanda	- -76
Sao Tome & Principe	6-20-78
Seychelles	10- -77
South Yemen	2-1-78
Tanzania	11-9-78
Togo	3- -76
Vietnam	3-3-79

25X1 [] nine-member Executive Committee is the formal executive body, but we suspect the shadow Revolutionary Command Council—perhaps an amalgam of the party's political and military wings—is the real power center.³ There may be other influential bodies representing specific interest groups, for example, the commanders of fighting units based at Tindouf. []

25X1 [] Nineteen governments recognize the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic. Eight, including Vietnam and Ethiopia, have granted recognition in the past 13 months, suggesting that the Front's diplomatic effort is gaining momentum. Morocco's decision in March to refuse to discuss further the Sahara issue in international forums inevitably will strengthen the POLISARIO's position. Rabat's decision in March 1976 to break relations with Algiers served as a deterrent to recognition of the Saharan government-in-exile by [] states that value relations with Morocco. Among the Arab states, only South Yemen has followed Algeria's lead in recognizing the SDAR. []

25X1 [] The POLISARIO leadership is closely allied politically to Algeria, with which it shares the common objective of weakening Morocco. That tie, however, should not obscure the fact that Saharan nationalists have their own interests and objectives and are not mere appendages of Algiers. []

25X1 [] An independent Saharan state would form close ties with Algeria and Libya, the latter probably the POLISARIO's second most important backer, and would be heavily dependent on them for financial assistance. A new Saharan regime would probably emulate these states in establishing an Arab socialist political and economic system. It would seek close political ties with "progressive" Third World states and adopt a nonaligned posture. POLISARIO leaders would probably retain interest in a relationship with the United States; they appear to appreciate the US policy of denying arms to Morocco for use in the Sahara. [redacted]

POLISARIO Front
(October 78)

Figure 2

The leaders of an independent Western Sahara—though presumably socialists—are probably not Moscow oriented. They might, however, be susceptible to efforts by the Soviet Union and Cuba to wield influence locally. The USSR, Cuba, and other Communist states currently give limited political and nonmilitary support to the POLISARIO cause. This could provide an opening wedge for Communist penetration into a newly created Saharan state. The Soviets and Cubans, however, might proceed cautiously for fear of causing strains in their relationship with Algeria and Morocco. [redacted]

Mauritania Drops Out

Coup and Disengagement

The military coup in Mauritania on 10 July 1978 ended 18 years of rule by Moktar Ould Daddah and brought to power a government committed to ending Mauritania's involvement in the dispute over Western Sahara. [redacted]

The decision to cast its lot with Morocco in partitioning the territory of the former Spanish colony proved fatal to the Ould Daddah government. Algerian President Boumediene warned Daddah in November 1975 that siding with Morocco would be his undoing. As the conflict unfolded in 1976, the POLISARIO Front shifted the focus of its attacks to Mauritania, the weaker of its

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

two antagonists. The relentless pressure of the guerrillas on the poorly trained and equipped Mauritanian forces ultimately broke the Mauritanians' will to fight.

- Mauritanian diplomatic recognition of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic.

By early March, Mauritania's talks with Algeria and the guerrillas appeared to have reached an impasse.

[Redacted]

[Redacted]

The new military government, led by President Mohamed Saleck, has, in effect, already withdrawn from the war, and it appears determined to extricate Mauritania from the dispute altogether. Mauritania has worked to preserve a cease-fire that the guerrilla declared unilaterally last July shortly after the coup. Nouakchott's leaders have made a permanent peace the Western Sahara their overriding objective, but many key factors are beyond their control.

Troubled Relations With Morocco

Mauritania's courting of Algeria and the POLISARIO

Front has created strains in its relations with Rabat. Such is the intention of the Algerians and the guerrillas, who exploit each opportunity to drive a wedge between Rabat and Nouakchott.

Moving cautiously in deference to Rabat, the Mauritanians have made extensive contacts with Algeria, the POLISARIO Front, and a number of potential mediators, including France, Libya, and Mali. Since the beginning of the year, the Mauritanian leadership, faced with growing POLISARIO impatience, has inched closer to a unilateral withdrawal from the Sahara. Public and private Mauritanian statements have indicated that Nouakchott now:

The obvious inability of Mauritania to continue its role in the costly conflict has encouraged Morocco to reassess its position and look for a political rather than military solution. Both Morocco and Mauritania now agree on the need for a negotiated settlement, but they diverge on tactics and Morocco is much tougher on terms. King Hassan recognizes that a harsh Moroccan reaction against Mauritanian peace feelers might backfire and drive Nouakchott to renounce its claims to its portion of the Western Sahara, leaving Rabat even more isolated internationally. For the near term, Mauritania will probably continue to press the Moroccans to take a more flexible approach toward negotiations in return for a pledge from Nouakchott not to conclude a separate peace with the guerrillas.

- Accepts the principle of Saharan self-determination.
- Would agree to a referendum under OAU or UN auspices.
- Admits tacit POLISARIO control of the Mauritanian sector of Western Sahara.

The principal constraint on Mauritanian freedom to seek a unilateral settlement is the presence in Mauritania of a 6,000- to 8,000-man Moroccan military force sent there in 1975-76 at the request of the Ould Daddah government. After the coup the new government requested their withdrawal. King Hassan grudgingly acceded, apparently in the belief that the political costs internationally of using Moroccan forces in Mauritania to block a separate peace would be prohibitive.

[Large redacted block]

[Redacted block]

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1C

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X6

25X6

7

25X1 Economic Imperatives

From Nouakchott's perspective, renewal of hostilities would be economically disastrous. Mauritania's decision to withdraw from the Saharan conflict was based largely on its worsening economic situation. The war created severe strains on the budget in the past two years even though Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and other Arab countries provided $400 million in financial support. During this period an estimated 60 percent of the budget was spent on defense, while nonmilitary spending was reduced by at least 20 percent.

25X1 The war cut deeply into Mauritania's foreign exchange earnings. Last year repeated guerrilla attacks against the vital iron ore rail line from the Zouerat mines to the port of Nouadhibou sharply reduced iron ore exports. Combined with falling iron ore prices, this cut into foreign exchange earnings. Iron ore export earnings for 1977 were $127 million below the average for the previous four years.

25X1 Although a settlement in the Western Sahara would improve Mauritania's long-term economic prospects, several factors preclude a quick recovery. The price of iron ore—which constitutes 86 percent of Mauritania's exports—is depressed on world markets and is not expected to recover soon. Mauritania therefore will need to diversify its exports and encourage more private participation—both foreign and domestic—in development schemes. Saudi Arabia and other affluent Arab states will remain necessary important sources of investment capital and financial assistance.

25X1 View from Algiers

25X1 New Regime's Position Toward Conflict

25X1 There is no slackening of support for the POLISARIO Front in the new Algerian Government under Chadli Bendjedid, who was elected President on 7 February. It has become clear that Algerian support for the POLISARIO Front before President Houari Boumediene's death was government policy as well as a personal commitment by Boumediene.

25X1 The new leadership has emphasized continuity with Boumediene's Saharan policy, implying support for maximum POLISARIO objectives. The inflexibility of Algeria regarding a face-saving compromise with Morocco on their dispute in part derives from internal power politics. President Bendjedid does not enjoy Boumediene's unchallenged authority and depends on the support of the Army. Until power relationships are sorted out, Bendjedid and his military backers will probably hold fast to Boumediene's Saharan policy to deny powerful rivals any exploitable openings.

Algeria has no territorial claims on the Sahara, although it has steadfastly maintained that it is an interested party with political and security interests to protect. In keeping with its carefully cultivated anticolonial image, Algeria has publicly supported a referendum on self-determination for the people of Sahara.

The realities of Algeria's position are more complex; Western Sahara is but one aspect of the larger problems of Algeria's relations with Morocco and Maghreb stability. Algiers opposes Moroccan absorption of the northern Sahara, with its rich phosphate deposits, because this could reduce Algerian pre-eminence in northwest Africa. The ideological divergence between socialist Algeria and the traditional monarchy of Morocco has intensified their geopolitical competition. Moreover, the specter of an irredentist Morocco, which has laid claim to part of Algeria, and memories of the 1963 border war have not faded.

Views Toward a Peaceful Settlement

Algeria's role will be crucial if there is to be a negotiated settlement of the Western Sahara conflict. Only Algeria has the leverage to persuade the guerrillas to come to the conference table. The Algerians provide the POLISARIO Front with vital military assistance—sanctuary, arms, and training—without which the guerrillas' fighting capability would be seriously impaired.

The chances are very slim that Algiers will decrease its support of the guerrillas in an effort to force them to accept a settlement that falls short of Saharan self-determination. There would seem to be little incentive for Algiers to abandon a policy that is succeeding in weakening its regional rival at relatively little cost.

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

[Redacted]

the Sahara as vital in domestic political as well as national strategic terms. Hassan links the successful absorption of the Sahara to his ability to compete with his primary geopolitical rival, Algeria. Having committed his personal prestige, moreover, Hassan would lose considerable domestic support.

[Redacted] he were to back away from Morocco's claims. [Redacted]

The Algerians have little interest in extricating Hassan from a war that is becoming an increasingly serious political liability for him. They would probably prefer keeping the Moroccan Army bogged down in a long and costly insurgency in the hope that Moroccan military coup plotters, war-weary and disgruntled with Morocco's mounting economic problems, will topple Hassan. Algerian leaders would see the end of the Alaouite dynasty as forestalling indefinitely Moroccan aspirations for hegemony in North Africa and clearing the way for Algerian preeminence in the region.

Small Cost of the War

Algiers can sustain its commitment to the POLISARIO at a relatively small cost. It presently provides financing, arms aid, logistical support, and a haven for both POLISARIO fighters and some 20,000 to 40,000 refugees near Tindouf. Financing the insurgency has not been a significant drain on Algerian resources and has not interfered with economic development, Algeria's number-one priority.

The proportion of Algeria's budget spent on national defense fell from 14 percent in 1976 to 10 percent in 1978, the latter amounting to $469 million. It is not clear that these figures include support for the POLISARIO Front. Such financial outlays, in any event, are probably small because the guerrillas have been supplied only with small arms, ammunition, and light equipment.

Morocco's Limited Options

Political Repercussions

The stability of King Hassan's regime is closely tied to the outcome of his Saharan venture. Hassan committed his personal prestige to this policy. His success in forcing Spain in 1975 to relinquish its Saharan province to Morocco and Mauritania greatly boosted his popular image initially, but enthusiasm has waned in the face of military stalemate and rising costs. (S)

Morocco's leadership, despite setbacks in the war, continues to view annexation of Morocco's portion of

The King's objective of absorbing the northern sector of the Western Sahara as an integral part of Morocco is popular, but his failure to achieve results is not. The unending conflict over mineral-rich Western Sahara is Hassan's principal preoccupation. Complaints from Moroccan citizens about the costs of the war and from students about the sacrifices involved in holding on to the Sahara have increased markedly. The King's moderate response to a highly embarrassing POLISARIO raid in late January on the southern Moroccan town of Tantan—even though intended to keep the door open for negotiations—evoked widespread criticism of the government.

The principal constraint on Hassan in preserving his hold on power is the loyalty of the armed forces. That loyalty cannot be taken for granted; the leaders of the two coup attempts in 1971 and 1972 came from the senior officer corps. Military officers, like their civilian counterparts, support Morocco's annexation of Western Sahara, but they are increasingly frustrated with the unending guerrilla war there. The inevitable strains on troops engaged in a no-win situation in the desolate Sahara have compounded other morale problems—poor discipline, lackluster leadership, and a poor logistics system.

Hassan's options in reaching a resolution of the three-year-long conflict that will leave his power intact are extremely limited. The Moroccan Army has demonstrated its inability to bring the insurgency under control and is steadily losing ground to the guerrillas. Hassan recognizes that a political settlement offers the only hope of extricating himself from this predicament. It is difficult, however, to visualize fruitful negotiations, given the inflexible positions of his opponents and the lack of incentive to push them to compromise.

Moroccan soldiers and equipment captured during raid on Tantan, Morocco

Unclassified © *

25X1 Hassan's ability to obtain a political settlement depends on a shared perception by all parties that a military solution is impossible and Morocco's willingness to make previously unpalatable territorial concessions. Algeria and the guerrillas may increasingly believe that a military solution in their favor is indeed possible. The cool response of Algeria's new leadership to the Moroccan Foreign Minister's peace feeler in an open letter on 1 February does not augur well for an early negotiated settlement. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

The declining fortunes of the Moroccan Army are converging with increasingly pressing domestic problems; together they encourage domestic opposition and weaken the King's position. In the absence of a political solution, the King's political skills will be severely tested in the year ahead. [redacted]

At some point Hassan may conclude that the risk of continuing the present policy outweighs that of changing it. With the cooperation of or coercion from the Army, he may eventually try some bold initiative, including major concessions, to break out of his increasingly constricting predicament. [redacted]

25X1

Economic Constraints

The Saharan venture is unlikely to divert popular opinion much longer from chronic economic problems of unemployment, inflation, and depressed wages, which are causing social unrest. The Western Sahara conflict has contributed to a marked downturn in Moroccan economic growth since late 1977 following five years of expansion. Other factors contributing to the economic slowdown are depressed prices for phosphates—Morocco's leading export—and European Community import restrictions on other Moroccan exports such as textiles. [redacted]

25X1

* Photograph from Algerie Presse.

Morocco's overall economic situation in 1979 appears considerably less favorable than it was two years ago. Foreign exchange holdings have declined steeply since mid-1977. Rabat has been forced to resort to large-scale foreign borrowing to finance a reduced version of an ambitious development program begun in 1975. Morocco's foreign indebtedness rose by about 50 percent to $4 billion during 1977 and by September 1978 was nearly $5 billion.

Sizable expenditures on military operations in the Western Sahara have aggravated budgetary problems. Although a foreign-financed defense budget—$800 million from Saudi Arabia alone—paid for many of the outlays through 1977, there have been large indirect costs that have fallen on the Moroccans. An estimated 40 percent of Morocco's 1978 budget of $4.1 billion went for military expenditures, and the outlay is likely to be as high this year.

Morocco's financial problems reached crisis proportions after Saudi aid flows were cut in early 1978. Since then, the burden of the Saharan war and the military modernization program has weighed heavily on Morocco. This setback, if not overcome, will force King Hassan to reconsider how much longer Morocco can finance the war.

Involvement of Outside Powers

Soviet Role

Soviet sympathy for the Algerian position on the Sahara issue is clear. The Soviets have supported Algeria's calls in the United Nations for self-determination for the Sahara, and they have collaborated with Libya in support of Algeria and the POLISARIO.

Indirect support of the POLISARIO offers several advantages to the Soviets. They have been able to avoid being pulled into deeper involvement in the crisis, particularly when direct clashes have occurred between Algerian/POLISARIO forces and Moroccan forces in the Sahara. The Soviets have also been able to avoid unnecessarily alienating the Moroccans, with whom they have negotiated a major deal involving phosphates. In addition, neither the Arab nor African nations were backing the Algerian position, and the Soviets did not want to be openly identified with a less-than-popular cause.

The Soviets have longstanding and expanding military assistance programs, a substantial economic aid program, and significant trade ties with Algeria. The integration of Soviet military equipment into the Algerian armed forces and its reliance on Soviet technical expertise have led to an expanded Soviet presence there. An estimated 1,000 Soviet military personnel and 2,500 civilians are currently in Algeria.

Even so, Algiers has been an inconsistent friend. It has publicly attacked Soviet aspirations in the Middle East and has rejected a special Soviet role among the nonaligned. The late President Boumediene periodically called for the removal of the Soviet as well as the US Navies from the Mediterranean.

The Soviets have apparently decided that they have little to gain by more forthright support for Algiers, although they remain a reliable source of military supplies. Although sympathetic to Algeria's interest in denying the Western Sahara to Morocco, Moscow has been publicly neutral on the issue in recent years and has withheld recognition of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic. The Soviets do not want to risk their growing economic stake in Morocco, and they will probably keep Algeria uncertain about Soviet backing in the event of hostilities.

The POLISARIO guerrillas currently count for little in Moscow's calculations. The Soviets are undoubtedly aware of the movement's potential value, but they recognize that Algeria wants to remain POLISARIO's principal foreign backer. Moscow probably would not want to jeopardize its ties with Algeria by seeking to influence Algeria's POLISARIO clients. Moscow has not

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

provided the POLISARIO any direct military support, but it has made no attempt to block Algeria's transfer of Soviet weaponry to the guerrillas. [redacted]

States moved dramatically to increase military shipments to Rabat, the Soviets would be under much greater pressure to respond with substantial resupply of Algeria. [redacted]

Political differences between Morocco and the USSR over Soviet and Cuban activity in Africa have not curbed the growth of commercial dealings that could make Rabat the Soviet Union's most important trading partner in Africa. The short-term prospects for Soviet political gains in Morocco are not good, but the Soviets may see in their commercial relations the basis for influence over the longer term [redacted]

French Interests

President Giscard, like his predecessors, sees North Africa as France's natural sphere of influence and believes France has a special responsibility to ensure stability and preserve French and to a lesser extent Western interests there. A durable solution would extricate France from a conflict that threatens extremely important if not vital French interests. Many thousands of French live and work in the former North African colonies in positions ranging from senior advisers and company directors to mechanics and shop clerks [redacted]

Of enduring importance to both countries is the $2 billion economic aid agreement signed in March 1978 for the development of the Meskala phosphate deposits. This 30-year arrangement—which could rise to $9 billion with trade and credit transactions—is the largest single accord Moscow has ever negotiated with a Third World country. It underscores the importance to the Soviet agricultural program of developing a stable source for this critical fertilizer component. A fishing agreement was signed the following month after Moscow assured Algeria that the agreement did not contain an implicit recognition of Moroccan claims to Western Sahara territorial waters. Moscow has also supplied to Morocco minor amounts of military equipment. [redacted]

Paris is primarily concerned that the moderate government of King Hassan, which faces manifold domestic and foreign policy problems including the Western Sahara, will be replaced by a "progressive" regime as difficult to deal with as Algeria. Although officially neutral in the Western Sahara dispute, France is pro-Moroccan because of its economic interests in and military relationship with Morocco and the congruence of French and Moroccan security interests elsewhere in Africa [redacted]

If the current level of fighting in the Sahara continues, the Soviets are likely to try to pursue their balancing act. In order to reaffirm their credentials with the new regime in Algiers, they may expedite deliveries of arms to Algeria, but they would probably couple this with intensified efforts to assuage Rabat. [redacted]

The French do not want a widening of the fighting in the Sahara nor a greater French military role, but they have been frustrated by the impotence of the Mauritanian Army—which they have been helping to train—to control the POLISARIO or protect French interests in Mauritania. [redacted]

Should large-scale fighting break out, the Soviets would offer political backing to Algeria and probably make at least a limited effort to resupply Algerian arsenals. This might consist of some resupply flights and an increased flow of seaborne arms deliveries. Nevertheless, Moscow is not likely to underwrite an all-out Algerian military effort against Morocco. [redacted]

With the changes of government in Algeria and Mauritania, France has tried to adopt a more balanced position. It has been acting as broker, but with little success. Paris wants to continue to improve its relationship with Algeria, with which it has more important trade ties than it has with Morocco [redacted]

The attitude of the United States toward a Moroccan-Algerian conflict would have an important bearing on Soviet policy. The Soviets do not currently view the Sahara issue as a superpower contest. But if the United

France has demonstrated in the past, however, that it is willing to risk Algerian hostility as well as domestic and international criticism by taking military action against the POLISARIO when it believes its interests are threatened. In the winter of 1977-78 and again in May 1978 France carried out effective air strikes in retaliation against the POLISARIO in Mauritania for the taking of French hostages from the mining complex at Zouerat. [redacted]

the Mediterranean coast of Morocco are coveted by Moroccans, and Madrid worries that friction with Rabat could provoke a "green march" against the enclaves. Spain is even more determined, however, to keep its Canary Islands—where Algiers has demonstrated an ability to stir up trouble among a small separatist group in order to apply pressure on Madrid to renounce the Sahara settlement. Spanish fishermen, moreover, are vulnerable to Moroccan-, Algerian-, and POLISARIO-sponsored attacks as they ply the fishing grounds off the Saharan coast [redacted]

France wanted to display its determination to protect French citizens and demonstrate to pro-French governments in Africa that Paris would use force when necessary to safeguard its interests. The raids were well received by the French public, which greeted with enthusiasm the subsequent release of the French hostages. The government recognizes, however, that military intervention usually pays few dividends domestically, especially should there be French casualties. Thus, France has been careful to emphasize the selective and defensive character of its strikes in Mauritania. [redacted]

The transition to democracy in Spain has also brought pressure on the government from the socialists—the principal opposition party—who threw their support to the Algerian-backed POLISARIO Front in 1977. Partly in order to protect his government from charges of favoring the Moroccan monarchy, Prime Minister Suarez has encouraged informal public contacts between leaders of his party and the POLISARIO; he also seemed to be moving toward a rapprochement with Algeria last fall when Boumediene's declining health interrupted negotiations. [redacted]

Should military hostilities break out between Algeria and Morocco, France would support Morocco militarily—discreetly, if possible. The French have continually stressed the need for a political solution and initially would probably offer to mediate. If unsuccessful, they probably would expedite delivery of previously ordered equipment to the Moroccans and might send some advisers. They might also provide pilots for restricted use in Morocco and the Western Sahara. Paris continues to promote the idea of an African mutual security organization, and the French might try to aid Morocco under the guise of an ad hoc African defense force. [redacted]

Torn by conflicting pressures, Madrid is likely to stay aloof from direct involvement in any negotiations. The Spanish Government believes that Spain pulled out of the Sahara just in time to avoid a colonial war, and it is determined not to be drawn back into the fray. In the event of hostilities between Morocco and Algeria Spain would keep its distance, while possibly offering to mediate. [redacted]

Spain's Residual Ties

Madrid's policy toward the Western Sahara is also based on a need to maintain a rough balance in its relations with Morocco and Algeria. Spain continues to pay lipservice to the Madrid Tripartite Agreements of November 1975, in which Madrid surrendered administrative power over the Spanish Sahara to Morocco and Mauritania. This position is calculated to please Morocco. Madrid has sought to hedge its bets and placate Algiers by insisting that sovereignty over the region resides with the people of the Sahara, whose aspirations toward independence must be determined in a UN-sponsored referendum. [redacted]

Should a settlement create an independent Saharan state, Madrid would probably offer what limited financial and technical aid it could to bolster the new regime. The Spanish Government would hope that such support would be favorably received internationally. Spain's support to an independent Western Sahara would also assuage guilt feelings over the precipitate withdrawal of Spanish forces in early 1976 and perhaps facilitate Spanish access to the phosphate deposits in the Sahara. [redacted]

Strong Spanish security interests in North Africa are closely tied to the struggle between Morocco and Algeria. The Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla on

Prospects

No Settlement in Sight

There seems to be little immediate prospect of a peaceful solution to the Saharan dispute, and the war is likely to drag on through its fourth year. Desultory settlement efforts between Morocco and Algeria had stalled at the time of Algerian President Boumediene's death last December. Neither Morocco nor Algeria has yet shown a willingness to back away from its basic position. Although changes of governments in Algeria and Mauritania might have been expected to break the stalemate, the dispute now seems even less tractable than when the war began more than three years ago.

The continuing negotiating deadlock is attributable to several factors. POLISARIO military capabilities in the Western Sahara are growing relative to those of the increasingly frustrated, dispirited, and ineffectual Moroccan Army. The guerrillas' battlefield successes are reinforcing the Algerians in their rigid Saharan policy. The Algerians show no sign of considering the withdrawal of their support to the guerrillas, the one pressure tactic that might compel the guerrillas to settle for something less than independence in all of the former Spanish Sahara. The POLISARIO Front seems more concerned with consolidating its military gains against an increasingly isolated Morocco than with formulating a negotiating position.

For his part, King Hassan is presently unwilling to consider compromises—self-determination and territorial concessions—that might encourage Algiers to press the guerrillas to adopt a more flexible posture. Hassan is likely to continue to temporize, perhaps hoping that outside powers—France or the United States, for example—will encourage Algeria to change its policies. He may also believe that he needs Arab mediation to provide a suitable framework to rationalize territorial concessions in the interests of Arab unity.

[Redacted]

The outlines of a political settlement are hard to visualize, given the present positions of the parties, and the likelihood is high that the insurgency will continue to threaten regional stability for some time.

Restraints Against a Moroccan-Algerian War

Costly and embarrassing attacks on Moroccan territory from Algerian-based POLISARIO guerrillas no doubt will continue, and King Hassan may be pressured into a more aggressive military policy toward Algeria. There is wide support in Morocco for direct strikes against POLISARIO sanctuaries near Tindouf in Algeria, even at the risk of war with Algeria.

Hassan's military alternatives for mounting a punitive operation against Algeria appear as bleak as his options to reach a political settlement of the conflict with the POLISARIO. While the King may permit commando raids against POLISARIO outposts near the Algerian border to assuage public opinion, he is unlikely to mount operations that would draw Algerian regular forces into the fighting. Given Algerian military strength in the Tindouf area, the chances of a successful Moroccan conventional attack are slight, and the costs are likely to be high.

25X6

25X1

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1

Next 32 Page(s) In Document Exempt

Approved For Release 2005/07/20 : CIA-RDP80T00942A000800130002-1