[redacted] the Chinese Communist Peoples' Volunteer Army in North Korea has shown the following signs of planning to remain there on a long-term basis, irrespective of the outcome of the truce talks:

- a. All Chinese Communist forces in Korea, except those directly engaged in combat, must engage in production. This implies that they will gradually change from combat units to reclamation army forces. The majority of these now engaged in land reclamation must pay 300 catties of vegetables per year to the military authorities.
- b. All Chinese Communist forces in Korea, except those directly engaged in combat, must participate methodically in army training programs at places where they are now stationed. The training now includes the use of new weapons, culture and education (sic). Only army units in front areas may hold marksmanship practices with live ammunition.
- c. Chinese Communist army supply and service organizations in Korea have engaged in numerous construction projects in North Korean rear areas, including warehouses, troop depots, etc.
- d. Chinese Communist Volunteer Army Headquarters have organized Korean language training classes and have drawn political workers of all grades into intensive training courses so they can smooth relations between the Chinese Army and Korean civilians in areas where Chinese troops are stationed.
