Dear Mr. Casey,

You will recall that some time ago [Redacted] and I came to visit you in your office [Redacted] on the occasion of asking your advice about funding a special project on the private enterprise system by a foundation of which both [Redacted] and I were trustees. You may be interested to know that your advice was followed; the grant was made, and the project has been extremely successful.

I now write on another matter. A colleague of mine from UCLA - Graduate School of Business Administration, Professor [Redacted] and I are working on a book on corporate intelligence. [Redacted] was one of the authors of the book.

I would like to ask if you would provide me with any unclassified material on the subject of business intelligence. If such material is available, and related to specific companies, might the corporate names be eliminated? Our objective is to be useful to the business community, not otherwise, and I have had a good deal of private support from senior executives in major corporations.

Naturally, it would be helpful if I could discuss the matter with you personally, and should be pleased to come to Washington to do so. For example, the history of the nomenclature of classified information is a subject we deal with briefly, and this, too, I think you would find interesting, and is a subject I would like to go over with you.

I know you have vastly more important things to do than to help a professor on a research and writing project, but I have thought that because of the nature of the research, and its inherent interest, and the people involved, that you might find some time to discuss it, and to ask someone on your staff to provide some related unclassified materials.

Sincerely,
