A nimble-fingered blackjack dealer who once worked the casinos in Havana and until recently was an active anti-Castro agent said sadly: "We are all playing a game that we can't win. The cards are stacked against us." In Miami not long ago, the Herald Tribune's Latin America Correspondent Barnard L. Collier found that the game being played against Fidel Castro is indeed a frustrating one—like "Monopoly" gone wrong. With some sardonic help from members of Miami's downhearted exiles—and no help at all from Parker Brothers—correspondent Collier worked out "The Fascinating Game of CARIBBEAN" to give Americans an idea of the maddening obstacles confronting the 300,000 Cuban exiles trying to reach Havana. Said the first person to play CARIBBEAN: "I played for two hours before I finally got into Cuba and the first time I picked a Castro card it said I was shot and had to leave the game. I don't think you can win." As things stand now, that's it precisely.
