Comment: The insurgents' security awareness appears to lessen in proportion to their familiarity with a situation. The insurgents have been careful, however, when unknown persons are involved. Guerrillas, for example, screen Afghan Army defectors and others seeking to join their bands. Their weak security practices suggest that the Soviets are not aggressively targeting some major infiltration routes.

AFGHANISTAN-USSR: INSURGENT ATTACKS INTO THE USSR

We believe Afghan insurgent raids across the Soviet border have been few and have had a negligible military impact. They probably have heightened Moscow's concern about border security and the stability of its ethnic minority areas close to the border, however, and tied up some Soviet forces. The forays probably also help to sustain the insurgents' morale.

Insurgent Crossings

25X1 insurgents have probably exaggerated their 25X1 successes when discussing the raids with Western journalists. We believe that most of the raids have occurred in the Tajik SSR, carried out by Jamiat-i-Islami insurgents; insurgent activities probably also extend into the Uzbek and Turkmen areas of the USSR. 25X1 Insurgent crossings are most likely to occur in early spring and early fall, when river levels are low enough to ford or to be crossed easily on inflated goatskin rafts 25X1 Insurgent leaders . recently told Western journalists that for three years they had been crossing the border into Tajikistan to mine roads and distribute Korans to their ethnic counterparts. In one instance in late 1984 25X1 a Soviet patrol ZUAT encountered a band of young, non-Russian speakers in a valley in Tajikistan. The encounter was peaceful, but the patrol returned the next day, suspicious that none of the group spoke Russian. Local people told the patrol that the band was "dushman"--the Russian word for "bandit" that is an epithet for the Afghan insurgents -- and that such groups regularly came to the valley and nearby areas "to rest." Moreover, 25X1 elderly Tajiks sometimes slipped across the border to die in their home villages. 25X1

Guerrillas also claim to have distributed propaganda in Soviet border areas and to have crossed into the USSR from Badakhshan and Konduz Provinces to mine Soviet roads.

Most insurgent raids, however, are probably no more than a continuation of a centuries-old tradition of livestock rustling along the border. Afghan Tajiks, assisted by their Soviet kinsmen, frequently attacked Soviet outposts north of Konduz Province to clear the way for stealing sheep from cooperative farms.

Soviet Border Security

The USSR's sensitivity about its borders, coupled with its concern about the insurgency, has prompted strict security along much of the Soviet-Afghan border. KGB Border Guards maintain careful control over the populated areas of the border region and closely monitor civilians in the area ______. Civilians in the zone are registered; travelers are checked for appropriate entry stamps and for legitimate reasons for entry; and residents are warned to report unusual activity or the appearance of strangers.

Security measures along the Soviet side of the border vary depending on the terrain.

-- Rugged terrain, sparse population, and lack of major transportation networks make crossings difficult in many areas where security is less intense.

-- The border area along the Pyandzh River (the upper Amu Darya), which is devoid of transportation routes or settlements and features extremely rugged terrain, particularly on the Soviet side, is characterized by only light Soviet security. It contains no border guard outposts but is probably patrolled periodically by air and monitored by remote surveillance or listening posts.

Outlook

The military and logistic obstacles to expanding the scope and effectiveness of insurgent raids will probably remain so considerable that they will preclude more extensive insurgent efforts to infiltrate the USSR. Border crossings are thus likely to remain infrequent and have little military impact.

The Central Asian Resistance

In parts of the USSR just north of Afghanistan, now organized as the Uzbek, Tajik, Turkmen, and Kirgiz republics, significant resistance to the imposition of Bolshevik control by indigenous Islamic peoples persisted for years following the October 1917 revolution. From early 1918 until 1924, and later in sporadic outbreaks well into the 1930s, Soviet forces fought guerrilla attacks by what Moscow called basmachis, another word for bandits, a term currently used in Soviet media to refer to resistance fighters in Afghanistan.

As the Russian civil war wound down, the Red Army moved into Central Asia and destroyed the most effective Central Asian leaders. Then they offered the guerrillas amnesty and spent money to lure tribal and clan groups from the resistance. In 1924, the newly created USSR reorganized the region along the ethnic and linguistic lines that exist today. Although represented as a move to respect national differences, the reorganization was designed to divide the groups to make them easier to rule. Forced collectivization in the late 1920s caused another upsurge in the fighting that continued until the late 1930s. By then the Russians had in place a group of local leaders willing to front for the Bolsheviks.
