Peru: Public Support for Drug Crop Eradication Increasing [redacted]

International funding for alternative development combined with growing public support for drug eradication may encourage President Fujimori to take a new look at anticoca measures. [redacted]

mori government recently outlawed opium cultivation, but it has not actively opposed the cultivation of coca out of concern that such a move would alienate farmers and increase their support to insurgents. However, as insurgent influence continues to decline, the Fujimori government may worry less about the political clout of coca growers—who consist of only about 1 percent of Peru's population.
