(b) (1) (b) (3)

Top Secret

National Intelligence Daily

Friday 14 March 1980

Top Secret

CÓ NID 80-0621X

COCY 000

	· .
Contents
Situation Reports
				3
Iran		• • • • • •	· • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

Top Secret

14 March 1980

A76487 3-80

It is increasingly likely that President Bani-Sadr will not get a clear majority in the parliamentary election that begins will not get a clear majority in the parliamentary election that begins with a divided legislature.  Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish towns.
It is increasingly likely that President Bani-Sadr will not get a clear majority in the parliamentary election that begins today, forcing him to deal with a divided legislature.  Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cesign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many Iranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
It is increasingly likely that President Bani-Sadr will not get a clear majority in the parliamentary election that begins today, forcing him to deal with a divided legislature.  Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cesign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many Iranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
It is increasingly likely that President Bani-Sadr will not get a clear majority in the parliamentary election that begins today, forcing him to deal with a divided legislature.  Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cesign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many Iranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any condidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cresign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	IRAN
Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any condidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cresign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any condidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cresign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	It is increasingly likely that President Bani-Sadr will not
Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many franians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	rot a alean majority in the parliamentary election that pegine
Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's chances have been hurt by the success of the militants at the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the mostage crisis.  Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	today, forging him to deal with a divided legislature.
Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	Western observers in Tehran believe that Bani-Sadr's
Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may cesign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	shanges have been hurt by the success of the militants
Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	the US Embassy in blocking his efforts to resolve the
Bani-Sadr probably will not get a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	norther origin.
a majority; in many districts, he has failed to field any candidates. Some observers believe that Bani-Sadr may resign if he concludes the legislature is dominated by his enemies.  A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many franians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist partiesespecially the radical Mujahedinhave been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	Bani-Sadr probably will not get
A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought. Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	majority; in many districts, no mass state Bani-Sadr may
A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	candidates. Some observers believe that be and a dominated by
A key factor will be the voters' perception of which candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	cesign if he concludes the legislature is dominated at
candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	nis enemies.
candidates have Ayatollah Khomeini's blessing. While he has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many tranians may conclude that Khomeini's recent moves supporting the militants indicate that he no longer fully backs Bani-Sadr.  The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	A key factor will be the voters perception or while he
The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	candidates have Ayatollan Knomeini's Diessing. While he
The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	has refused to endorse any candidates specifically, many
The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	ruaniana may conclude that knomelni's recent moves sup
The election campaign has been very hard fought.  Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	porting the militants indicate that he no longer lurry
Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	backs Bani-Sadr.
Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	Land Carrella
Leftist parties—especially the radical Mujahedin—have been particularly visible, although Khomeini has urged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	The election campaign has been very hard rought.
been particularly visible, although knometh has diged Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	restint newting-meanerially the radical Mulanedin-mave
Iranians to boycott the left. Voting has been suspended in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	Lass marking arty wigible. Although Knomethi has uryed in Sanandaj, the capital of Kordestan Province, allegedly because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	turnians to howgoth the left. Voting has been suspended because of security problems, but probably also because of leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	in command the capital of Kordestan Province, dilegeory leftist influence among the Kurds; the Interior Ministry today said the presence of "armed groups" probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish today said the presence of "armed groups probably will force a postponement of balloting in several other Kurdish	. A.J., J.A.J., AMANA THA KIYARI TAR INTRIBUTAL MINISPERI force a postponement of balloting in several other kuldish	LIBER WALL WAS SERVED OF "STORY DICULD WILLIAM THE towns.	force a nostponement of balloting in several other Kurdish
LOWIIS.	torms
	COMITS.