ANNEX 2

Chinese Representation in the UN

It now appears that a resolution calling for the seating of Peiping and the removal of Nationalist China from the UN will for the first time come close to or possibly even achieve a simple majority vote in the Assembly.

Whether Peiping actually attains a majority continues to hinge in large part on the decisions of only a few African and Middle Eastern countries. Congo Brazzaville, the Central African Republic, Kenya, and Zambia seem certain to add new votes to Peiping's total. Dahomey is probably also now in Communist China's column. Cyprus, Malaysia, Sierre Leone, Malawi, Malta, Chad, Senegal, and perhaps a few other West African and some Arab states are still uncertain and presumably open to persuasion.

50X1

The problem of maintaining the "important question" ruling is now receiving prime consideration. In 1961 the General Assembly voted 61 to 34 to consider the Chinese representation issue an "important question," thereby requiring a two-thirds vote to seat Peiping. In the US view, this ruling stands unless formally reversed by a subsequent vote in the Assembly, but should the Assembly decide to reconsider, the ruling could presumably be overturned by a simple majority.

It appears certain that some form of resolution will have to be passed reaffirming the 1961 ruling. Some countries which plan to vote for Communist China are apparently willing to uphold the two-thirds requirement should that be put to a vote.

.50X1 50X1

Even with two-thirds rule in force, Chiang Kai-shek might withdraw from the UN, if Peiping should gain the votes of a simple majority.
